Mr. President, possibly I am getting too far away from the text upon which I opened my few rambling remarks. I want to again say that the conferees upon the public-building bill who have been compelled to surrender have done so most reluctantly, and they owe, and so far as I am concerned I tender, to this body humble apologies for putting the Senate in the position of having to take what is doled out to it, followed by the grand bluff that we shall have to take what they say or nothing.

Possibly the chairman of our committee may be able to shed some light upon this matter that I have failed to shed, and if so, I shall be glad to have him do so; but I think that he will agree with me in the main.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think the Senate conferees have acted very properly in finally yielding under the circumstances which have been stated. I was satisfied that that was the only chance of securing the passage of the bill, and I think it better that the Senate conferees should have yielded than it would be to have the defeat of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if he does not think if we had told the House conferees that we would not yield, and they discovered that it was their only chance to pass this bill, they perhaps might not have yielded?

Mr. COCKRELL. That I can not answer.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to know whether the Senate conferees do that under any circumstances. We hear every winter at the close of the session as to matters which are absolutely righteous and just which the Senate has put into various appropriation bills on full consideration, and which we know, if the House could have a chance to vote on them, they would put in—nobody doubts that—but some one man informs our conferees that there can not be any bill passed unless some provision is yielded, and then we back down. Did the Senator ever hear of a Senate conference committee standing up and carrying its point on anything in the world? I do not remember any such case at present.

Mr. COCKRELL. I can tell the Senator——

Mr. HOAR. I do not speak of this bill particularly, because I have no doubt the bill was well managed by the conferees, but I am speaking of appropriation bills generally.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will tell the Senator of a case. The Senator asked for a case where the House had yielded to the Senate.

The House yielded when the Senate put on an appropriation for clerks to Senators. [Laughter.] That is my recollection, and I was chairman of the subcommittee which had charge of it.

Mr. NELSON. I want to inform the Senator from Massachusetts that there was one case of a conference where the Senate made its point, and that was on the bill for the creation of the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. HOAR. I will take the question back. If my friend from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] was on the conference committee, I am sure the Senate conferees did not yield. [Laughter.]

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, I wish to say but a few words.

Mr. CARMACK. I fear the Senator will about use up all of my time. I have no objection to the Senator proceeding, but I want it understood that I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I do not expect to speak but briefly.

Mr. CARMACK. The Senator may take as much time as he pleases.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I understand the conference report has the right of way, and that the time I occupy will not be deducted from the time of the honorable Senator.

I suppose that there is no conference report which is exactly what each House would desire. Certainly it is not the rule that conference reports are always what both Houses wish. Conference agreements are necessarily reached after a free and full interchange of opinion of the conferees of both Houses, and after some concessions are made by one or both parties to the conference. The report as it appears here is the result of long and tedious conferences between the conferees of the two Houses. It has not been made hastily or without the utmost consideration and effort to compose the divergent views of the two Houses.

It is true, as stated by the honorable Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], that the bill originally framed was framed after conferences with some of the leaders of another branch of the public service. It was framed after conferences with many Senators who were interested in the subject. After the bill went to the House it was amended in certain respects, and a number of very important provisions contained in it as it left the Senate were stricken out in the House.

It is true that there were several new sites added to the bill, involving a comparatively small amount of money. In the conference we succeeded in persuading the House conferees to recede from their amendments striking out many important provisions in the Senate bill.

The particular controversy in conference was with respect to the items regarding new sites which were added in the other House. We found it impossible, Mr. President, to induce the House conferees to yield with respect to those items. They receded, however, from the House amendment striking out many important provisions of the Senate bill.

The Senate conferees took the sense of Senators who are interested in new and old propositions with respect to the attitude of the House conferees; they frankly advised Senators as to the exact nature of the difference; and I may say that it was largely the preponderating judgment that it was, under all the circumstances, eminently fair and just that the pending report should be made and adopted.

My good friend the honorable and able Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] knows from his interviews with other Senators how important it is that the bill in its larger effect should pass at this session of Congress.

I regret that the conferees on the part of the House did not consent to yield with respect to the new items. I do not entertain the opinion, Mr. President, that they were not acting with candor or with entire frankness. I did not understand that they were acting with any ungenerous motive.

They said to us, and their judgment was concurred in by the leading Senators upon this floor upon both sides of the Chamber, that in the present posture of affairs in the other branch of Congress an amendment of the bill was fatal to its passage at this session. Even the report of a disagreement meant that the report would lose its privilege and be lost in the other House.

There is among the items included in the House amendments probably none which would not be approved here, Mr. President, were we dealing with it as an original proposition, and we yielded to them because they were in a large sense in the public interest, and because, without so agreeing, the entire bill with emergent measures of vast importance must utterly fail.

The Government gets no direct pecuniary return from them. Not so with respect to expenditures for public buildings. The Government must have public business houses; it must have public buildings in which to transact its business affairs, and if the Government does not build them and own them it must pay tribute to private and corporate property owners to accommodate its business.

For every dollar to be appropriated to construct post-office buildings and court-houses the Government will get a substantial equivalent in the saving of rents which are now paid out of the public Treasury. It is not a squandering of the public money, but it is an investment of public money that will yield substantial and ready returns.

Is it better policy to occupy inadequate accommodations in many cities through the country and pay high rents therefor, or is it better that the Government should have a permanent habitation and home, owning the property and saving all or a large part of the annual expenditure for rents which is now necessary?

Mr. President, the bill is not perfect. To some of its provisions I objected. It does not agree entirely with my own judgment as to what it should be, but in a large way I think it is a wholesome and beneficial measure, and it was because of that fact we agreed upon the pending report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report,

The report was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the act (S. 6895) to authorize the promotion of Maj. William Crawford Gorgas, surgeon in the Army of the United States.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7659) to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to amend sections 5191 and 5192 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes."

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 15802) for the relief of certain homestead settlers in the State of Alabama; and

A bill (H. R. 17085) to effectuate the provisions of the additional act of the international convention for the protection of industrial property.

TRANSFER OF JURISDICTION OVER IMMIGRATION BUREAU.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. I ask the Senator from Tennessee to yield to me that I may introduce at this time a joint resolution, which is considered essential with reference to the Immigration Bureau.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CARMACK. I do.

Mr. PENROSE. I introduce a joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S. R. 170) for the transfer of the authority, power, and jurisdiction conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury by the act "to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States" to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That all the authority, power, and jurisdiction conferred by the act to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States upon the Secretary of the Treasury be, and the same hereby are, transferred to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, to take effect on and after July 1, 1903.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. HOAR. What effect does that have on the enforcement of the law with reference to anarchists? Does it put them under the Department of Commerce?

Mr. PENROSE. I will state, for the information of the Senator from Massachusetts, that this is simply to transfer after July 1 the authority given to the Secretary of the Treasury to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. HOAR. I understand. But is the Department of Commerce to have, after July 1, the enforcement of the provisions which have been inserted in the immigration bill in regard to anarchists?

Mr. PENROSE. I understand, Mr. President, that the Secretary of Commerce and Labor will have all the powers given by that bill to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. LODGE. If my colleague will allow me, the first of the anarchist clauses relates to certain prohibited persons, and that would be enforced by the Immigration Bureau, wherever it is placed. The law we passed here puts that under the Department of Commerce and Labor.

The second of the anarchist clauses, which relates to naturalization, does not come under the Immigration Bureau at all.

Mr. HOAR. That I understand. What I wished to inquire about was this: The statute for the protection of the President had added to it in the other House, as it will be remembered, some provisions in regard to the admission of anarchists and the deportation of anarchists if they got in, and so on. That was transferred, on the motion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], I think, to the immigration bill. Does this joint resolution leave the execution of that law hereafter to the Department of Commerce and Labor?

Mr. PENROSE. I will state that my understanding is that this joint resolution substitutes the Secretary of Commerce and Labor for the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HOAR. In that particular?

Mr. PENROSE. In every particular referred to in the immigration act which we have passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15702) to amend an act entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," approved March 8, 1902.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President, I regret very much the condition of the public business, and especially with reference to the pending bill. I wish very much that we could have a vote upon this bill and dispose of it at the present session of Congress. I am not very enthusiastic for the bill in the form in which it is presented to this Senate, with a reduction to only 50 per cent of the rates of the Dingley tariff. I think if I were confronted with the necessity of voting for that or nothing at all, that I should vote for it and with a good deal of contempt.

We know very well—in fact, it is notorious—that it was considered impossible to pass any measure at all reducing the tariff on Philippine products until Mr. Oxnard, after being labored with and persuaded for several weeks, finally issued an ultimatum to the effect that he was willing that the tariff should be reduced to the extent of 50 per cent of the Dingley rates, but that he would not suffer a reduction of a single cent below that amount. It seems to me if the Senate is in a condition where it can legislate only by and with the consent of Mr. Oxnard, it would be better for it to wait until it gets in a position where it can legislate according to its own will and according to its own sense of duty.

I say, Mr. President, I am sorry that things are in such a condition that it is impossible properly to consider or to pass this bill at the present session of Congress. But I think it ought to be clearly understood where the responsibility lies for that condition of affairs. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] said the country would know where the responsibility lies for the defeat of the bill that he has been urging upon the Senate, and that the responsibility lay with those who have stood here and talked it to death. I want to say that I will accept without murmuring whatever small share of that responsibility falls to me, but I must add that in my opinion the Senator from Rhode Island and his associates upon the other side of the Chamber more than anyone else are responsible for the defeat of the bill he has been urging, and for the defeat or the failure of the Philippine tariff bill and other important legislation which is now gasping its last hour upon the table.

The Senator talks about the men who have talked his bill to death. The Senator from Rhode Island has talked his own bill to death. When he and those upon the other side of the Chamber who were associated with him in their long filibuster against the stoodhood bill talked that bill to death and frittered away all the time of the Senate until there was not enough left properly to consider other measures, he killed his own bill, and the country will understand and those who are most interested in that measure will understand that the Senator himself is more responsible for the defeat of the bill he has been urging upon the Senate than is anybody else in this Chamber.

The Senator from Rhode Island did not do very much talking himself and with his own mouth, but the Senator from Rhode Island is one of those men who does most of his talking through other men's mouths; and when he kept his men upon the other side of the Chamber talking for weeks and weeks against the omnibus statehood bill, he frittered away so much of the time of the Senate that there was no time left in which properly to consider the measure he has been urging upon the Senate, and for that reason his bill has failed. For that reason the Philippine tariff bill will have to fail, and for that reason other important legislation will fail—because there is no proper time in which to consider those measures.

The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] was pressing a bill upon the consideration of the Senate, and rose in his place and said if another speech—there had been only one speech made in opposition to his bill—was to be made against his bill he would have to abandon it.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator is as mistaken as ever a benighted individual was in this world. I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. CARMACK. Of course, we are all benighted in comparison with the luminous and illuminating intellect of the great and distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, but all the same the Senator did substantially say that very thing, and the RECORD will show it.

Mr. HOAR. Now the Senator has got to "substantially." I never said that thing, either verbally or otherwise. I will see what I said in a moment.

Mr. CARMACK. The Senator did say if there was to be further debate upon his bill he would have to abandon it; that he could not pass it at this session of Congress. I do not care to have any dispute with the Senator from Massachusetts about it, because it is impossible to make a statement with reference to any statement of the Senator from Massachusetts without causing him to lose his temper and get crusty. He is a young man of very ill temper sometimes.

But the fact is that there was no proper time for the consideration of that great measure which the Senator was urging upon the Senate, and it had to be abandoned after only one speech had been made in opposition to it when probably there would not have been more than one or two more speeches made. He had to abandon the measure because there was no time for proper debate.

Mr. President, in reference to the Philippine tariff bill pending here, as I said, I wish we could pass the bill, or rather I wish we could pass the bill striking out all tariff on all products from the Philippine Islands, and if we could not do that, reducing it to 25 per cent of the rates of the Dingley tariff. If we could not do that, I would probably vote for a rate of 50 per cent, although, as I said, I would do it with a good deal of contempt, and I do not know but that I would have a good deal of contempt for myself if I voted for a bill that was dictated to the Senate by Mr. Oxnard, of the beet-sugar trust.

I want to say to my friend the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] that in my judgment the time will come when all tariffs will be stricken off of all products that come to this country from the Philippine Islands, if we are to hold that country as a part of the possessions of the United States. Otherwise it will be simply impossible properly to govern that country, because we have to keep the people of the Philippine Islands in a proper mood and in a proper disposition toward the people of the United States if we are to govern them properly and successfully; and we can not do that by discriminating against their products. We must determine whether we will give up the Philippine Islands or whether we will govern them as a part of the territory of the United States.

There are some people in my State who are growers of tobacco; we have a considerable tobacco interest: but I am not going to vote against what I believe to be correct and honest principles of government in order to favor men in my State or anywhere else; and if the Philippine Islands are to be held under the flag of the United States they will have to be treated as a part of the territory of the United States and their people as a part of the people of the United States. I do not care how many supreme courts deliver revolutionary opinions declaring that the Constitution does not go where the flag of the United States goes. I believe it goes there or ought to go there, and I am going to vote according to my conscientious convictions upon that question.

We have had a very woeful picture drawn here of the conditions in the Philippine Islands. I doubt very much whether this tariff bill will have any great effect on that. I think my friend the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] is right to the extent of saying that this bill would not have any great effect in alleviating the conditions in the Philippine Islands. I am not supporting it on that ground. I do not believe it would do any good. I do not believe that Mr. Oxnard would ever have consented for the bill to pass the Senate in this form if he had believed it could possibly have done him any harm or have done the Filipinos any good. I am not voting for it for that reason. I am voting for it because I want to get down just as near to free trade with the Philippine Islands as I possibly can, and if we can not have constitutional free trade with the Philippine Islands I want to get just as near to the Constitution as I can. For that reason I will vote for any bill reducing the tariff upon all products coming from the Philippine Islands.

In regard to the conditions there, Mr. President, I will just remark in passing that we have some very confusing statements on that question. The President of the United States, in a public speech in my city, Memphis, declared that the people of the Philippine Islands had never, in all their history, been as prosperous as they were at that time. He said that their progress in material well-being was astounding. Then he comes back to Washington and sends in a message to the Congress of the United States, begging it, for God's sake, to do something for the Filipinos, because they are starving to death. That is just about as much as the Administration knows about conditions in the Philippine Islands. It does not know because it does not care to know and it does not try to know.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Tennessee kindly yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CARMACK. The Senator from Tennessee is done.

Mr. HOAR. I have from the Official Reporters verbatim et literatim what I said. I suppose the Senate has not forgotten what the Senator from Tennessee said I said. Here is what I said:

Mr. HOAR. I said when this matter was called up that if there was any serious desire on the part of any considerable number of Senators that it should not be disposed of now I would not press it. To that purpose I adhere. I had hoped that when the Senator from Georgia had completed his remarks, and possibly one or two other Senators had made some brief statements of their views, as we might as well have a vote on the measure now as at any time, that that would be the desire of the Senate; but I do not think within twenty-four hours of our final adjournment that I ought to press it if that proposition be not concurred in.

That is what I said, and then the Senator made that statement and accused me of losing my temper because I did not submit to it.

Mr. CARMACK. I hope the Senator will not leave yet.

Mr. HOAR. I am not going to leave.

Mr. CARMACK. I want to say to the Senator that if he will go back and get the next page he will get the language to which I refer.

Mr. HOAR. What followed was that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] rose and said he desired to go on with his speech. Then the Senator from Colorado rose and said that there would be other speeches, and that he did not think we could finish the bill at this session, and I withdrew it; that is all.

Mr. TELLER. That is correct.

Mr. HOAR. That is correct.

Mr. CARMACK. The Senator from Massachusetts got the wrong page.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Tennessee has the wrong story.

Mr. CARMACK subsequently said: I should like to know if the senior Senator from Massachusetts is in the Chamber?

Mr. LODGE. No; he has gone home and will not return this evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The Chair is informed that the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has gone to his home.

Mr. CARMACK. Having now seen the official report, I wish to refer to the matter of the dispute between the Senator and myself as to what occurred in debate to-day, but I will defer the matter until the senior Senator from Massachusetts is here.

Mr. CARMACK. I renew my request to have printed the matter that I sent to the desk some time ago.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks that there be printed in the RECORD some papers which he sends to the desk and to which he referred in the earlier part of the day. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and they will be printed in the RECORD.

The papers referred to are as follows:

"An informal meeting was held Thursday morning at Senator CARMACK'S office in the Senate Annex for the purpose of hearing certain witnesses to atrocities in the Philippines who had been in Washington for several days and had been refused a hearing by the Committee on the Philippines.

"A letter of invitation to be present was sent to Senator LODGE and all the members of the Committee on the Philippines to hear the statements of these witnesses and cross-examine them if they desired to do so. The Republican members of the committee were not in attendance. The minority of the committee was represented by Senators CARMACK and PATTERSON.

"Senator CARMACK stated that the Senate committee had stopped the investigation last summer with a long list of witnesses before it for whose attendance subpœnas had been asked. It had defeated, by a strict party vote, a resolution to continue the investigation during the session of Congress. A resolution calling for a full account of the court-martial proceedings was also voted down, and a substitute adopted that a summary be made by the War Department.

"When asked if there were many witnesses on the list who had not been summoned last summer, Mr. CARMACK said: 'There must have been 15 or 20 witnesses whose testimony was important who were not summoned.' Mr. LODGE said: 'A list as long as my arm.'

"There were three witnesses present at the hearing and two others heard by affidavit. These latter had been in Washington for several days, but having been refused a hearing were obliged to return to their homes. Of the three present, Lieut. John F. Hall and William Moore were formerly members of the Twentieth Kansas, Funston's regiment, and the other, Daniel J. O'Connor, of Pittsburg, Pa., was an enlisted man on the United States gunboat Paragua.

"The statement of Moore, which had been sworn to in the morning at the request of Judge-Advocate-General Davis, of the War Department, who asked for a copy of it, was read. It is as follows:

WASHINGTON CITY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, to wit:

This is to certify that I, William Moore, of Aliceville, Kans., was formerly a member of Company E, Twentieth Kansas, United States Volunteers; that at the battle of Caloocan, February 10, 1899, I acted as orderly to Maj. Wilder C. Metcalf, being detailed for that purpose; that I was with the Major when our boys crossed the insurgent trenches before Caloocan; that among the insurgent dead in the trenches was found two live Filipinos, who threw down their arms and surrendered, holding their hands up clasped as if in prayer, begging for mercy. Captain Bishop, who was near, said to Major Metcalf, "Metcalf, what will we do with these prisoners?" Lieut. Collin Ball, who was also near, said, "The only thing we can do with them is to send them to the rear under guard." Then Bishop spoke up and said, "No; we haven't got men to spare to send to the rear; shoot them where they are at." Then Major Metcalf turned to me and said, "Orderly, have you got a load in your gun?" I answered, "No." Metcalf said, "Put one in and kill these prisoners." I said, "I will not." Then Captain Bishop spoke up and said to Major Metcalf, "You kill one and I will kill the other."

Then Captain Bishop and Major Metcalf fired their revolvers, each killing a prisoner. During this brief discussion the prisoners were begging for mercy, one of them throwing himself upon his knees before Major Metcalf, and putting his arms around Metcalf's legs appeared to beg for his life. I was standing but 10 or 15 feet away when these prisoners were killed. I saw them (Captain Bishop and Major Metcalf) point their revolvers, saw the smoke, and saw the Filipinos fall dead, and know of a certain that they (Captain Bishop and Major Metcalf) and they alone fired the shots that killed these two prisoners. There may have been other prisoners killed by other officers or men which I did not see, but there can be no mistake as to who killed these two prisoners I speak of. This killing took place at the Filipino trenches, some hundred and fifty yards before the church was reached, and a little to the right of the wagon road leading from Manila to Caloocan and between the wagon road and the railroad.

WILLIAM MOORE.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 26th day of February, A. D. 1903.

ANTHONY RAY,
Notary Public, District of Columbia.

"Moore also told of an incident that he witnessed during his service as follows:

In the churchyard at Caloocan, a wounded Filipino prisoner lay on the ground as he passed through, his musket lying some distance from him, quite out of his reach. Private Craig, of E company, passed near the prisoner, and the wounded man rolled over to get out of the way, as I thought, but Craig said he rolled over to get at his gun. Craig said to Captain Christy: "What shall we do with this fellow?" Christy said: "You know your orders; kill the black —— of a —— where he lies." Private Craig immediately ran his bayonet through him, pinioning him to the ground. As he started to pull his bayonet out, it caught and dragged the Filipino along the ground. Craig put his foot against him and shouted: "Get off of here, you —— of a ——; I don't want to lug you around with me." The man was then dead, and I saw and heard it all.

"Lieut. John F. Hall was the next witness to make a statement, which follows:

We landed in Manila December 11, 1898, and found the city completely surrounded by Filipino forces. Our force at that time was something in the nature of 20,000 troops, stationed principally on the outskirts of Manila. So close together were our lines that the Filipino outpost and our outpost came in contact with each other constantly. At first there was a friendly feeling existing between our troops and the Filipinos. We were permitted to pass through the Filipino lines, and the Filipino officers and soldiers were allowed to pass through our lines into Manila.

This friendly feeling existed until President McKinley issued his proclamation declaring sovereignty over the Philippine Islands. The next morning after this proclamation was issued every wall in the city of Manila was covered with Aguinaldo's proclamation, declaring that if they (the Americans) attempted to take possession of the islands the Filipinos would fight. The friendly feeling heretofore existing between the Filipino forces and ours ceased. We did not visit the Filipino lines, and their visits to Manila were less frequent. Our outposts being in contact with each other, very naturally began to show a hostile spirit toward one another.

The first shot was fired early in January, 1899, by Private Casey, of the First Montana Regiment. Lieut. Col. E. C. Little, of the Twentieth Kansas, happened to be the field officer that day, and immediately put Casey under arrest and notified the Filipino commandante that the shot was unauthorized, thus preventing an outbreak at that time. Bad feeling continued to grow worse between our troops until the night of February 4, 1899, when a Nebraska outpost fired upon a Filipino patrol and brought on the conflict.

I had command of the outpost guard of the Twentieth Kansas on or about February 2. I know that secret orders were given me at that time to bring on a conflict if possible; that it was the wish of a large majority of the higher officers at Manila; that they would be glad to see a conflict take place between the American and Filipino forces. Colonel Funston, then of the Twentieth Kansas, told me this, and also told me that while the instructions from General Otis was to prevent a conflict, yet if the opportunity presented itself to start something if it was possible. I remember writing a letter to my brother, which was subsequently published in a Kansas paper, before the outbreak occurred, stating that we expected the fighting would soon begin.

On February 7, 1899, Colonel Funston took Companies B and I, and I think E, of the Twentieth Kansas, and made an attack on the Filipinos in front of our regiment before Caloocan. In that battle Lieut. Fred Alford, of B Company, a very popular officer in the regiment, and Sergt. J. Sheldon, of I Company, were killed. Several others were wounded. By some cause Alford's death was reported to have occurred by a Filipino shooting him in the back of the head after our lines had passed over them; but this statement was contradicted by Captain Crause (then first lieutenant of H Company, Twentieth Kansas), who said Alford was hit under the eye.

The battle of Caloocan was fought February 10, from about 3.30 p. m. until 5.30 or 6 o'clock that same afternoon. Just prior to the opening of the battle secret orders were passed down the lines to burn the town and take no prisoners. These orders were not official, and I paid no attention to them. After the battle of Caloocan it was common talk among the officers and men of the Twentieth Kansas that a number of prisoners had been killed.

At a meeting of the regimental officers at Major Metcalf's headquarters, in the trenches at Caloocan, just prior to an advance against Malolos, the question was asked Colonel Funston by Lieutenant Wisner in regard to the killing of prisoners. Lieutenant Wisner said: "How about killing prisoners, Colonel?" referring, of course, to our proposed advance against Malolos. Funston replied: "Don't kill any more prisoners than you have to," winking his eye at the same time. The way he said this led me to believe, as well as other officers of the Twentieth Kansas, that it was a matter of very little concern to Colonel Funston how many prisoners were killed.

The subject of killing prisoners at Caloocan was treated very lightly until we received orders from the War Department at Washington, while we were encamped at Malolas, P. I., to investigate the alleged killing of prisoners at Caloocan by Captain Bishop. This investigation was placed in the hands of Major Mallory, of General MacArthur's staff. Soon after this investigation was started we began our movements from Malolas against San Fernando. As soon as the investigation began to develop and implicate others besides Captain Bishop, Funston proceeded to use his influence to thwart it and protect those who were guilty of killing prisonersat Caloocan.

Those men who were eyewitnesses to the killing of prisoners at Caloocan were never called nor examined by Major Mallory. The regiment was relieved from duty at San Fernando June 26, 1899, and returned to Manila to await transportation home. While in Manila there was an investigation by some three or four officers of the Twentieth Kansas—a regimental investigation. That investigation brought out the affidavits of Harris O. Huskey, of K Company, and Donnell Thorne, of K Company. Huskey stated under oath that he was orderly for Col. Wilder S. Metcalf at the battle of Caloocan February 10, 1899, and that he saw Metcalf shoot an unarmed prisoner.

Thorne stated under oath that he saw Captain Bishop shoot into the bodies of two wounded prisoners at the battle of Caloocan. Maj. Wilder S. Metcalf (then colonel of Twentieth Kansas) was well aware of the fact then that Huskey had made an affidavit, as Huskey was taken before him and confronted him (Metcalf) with the charge of killing a prisoner. No steps were ever taken by Metcalf to punish Huskey or court-martial him for this grave charge, although Huskey was then a member of Company K of the same regiment.

Soon after Funston had returned to San Francisco from his trip to Kansas on the muster-out of the Twentieth Kansas, Huskey's affidavit appeared in the Associated Press dispatches of the United States. Funston immediately took steps to counteract that affidavit. He secured a statement from Harold V. Chambers, formerly a member of Company K, Twentieth Kansas, who had just enlisted in the Regular Army at San Francisco and whose home was in San Francisco. Funston obtained from Chambers a statement to the effect "that Lieut. John F. Hall, of the Twentieth Kansas, had gotten Harris O. Huskey, a member of his company, drunk in Manila, and while Huskey was under the influence of intoxicating liquor secured his signature to the affidavit executed before F. H. Lawton, judge-advocate of a general court-martial in Manila," charging Maj. Wilder S. Metcalf with the deliberate and cold-blooded murder of an unarmed prisoner of war in the battle of Caloocan, February 10, 1899.

Funston also made threats against Huskey and Thorne, to the effect that they would be punished upon his return to the Philippine Islands for making these affidavits, both of these men having enlisted in the Eleventh United States Cavalry, which was at that time located in the Philippines.

After Funston had returned to the Philippine Islands, written charges were preferred against him and Col. Wilder S. Metcalf by me for the killing of prisoners in the battle of Caloocan, February 10, 1899, and also for brevetting Colonel Metcalf to be brigadier-general of volunteers, and filed with the Adjutant-General of the United States Army January 9, 1900. In pursuance of these charges a board of court-martial, or, rather, a board of investigation, composed of Army officers, was ordered to inquire into the charges and fix the responsibility for killing the prisoners.

While the board was performing its work in the Philippines someone, either by bribery or coercion, or both, induced Harris O. Huskey, then a private in troop A, Eleventh Cavalry, United States Volunteers, to make an affidavit denying that he had ever seen Metcalf kill a prisoner in the battle of Caloocan. Huskey stated in his affidavit that while he was under the influence of intoxicating liquor, taken to relieve a severe toothache, Captain Boltwood, late of the Twentieth Kansas, had induced him to go before Judge-Advocate Lawton in Manila and make his affidavit charging Metcalf with the killing of prisoners.

I wish to state that I was not in Manila at the time Huskey made his affidavit before Lieut. F. H. Lawton to the effect that Metcalf had killed prisoners at the battle of Caloocan, but I was absent on court-martial duty and either at Candaba or San Fernando. The original affidavit was given to me by Captain Boltwood upon my return to Manila July 27, 1899. I made a true and exact copy of it and submitted the same to Lieut. F. H. Lawton for his verification.

After the battle of San Tomas, P. I., May 4, 1899, Colonel Funston was promoted brigadier-general of volunteers. He recommended Maj. Wilder S. Metcalf for a colonelcy of the Twentieth Kansas, well knowing at the time that Metcalf had been charged with the killing of a prisoner of war at the battle of Caloocan. About the time the regiment was mustered out Funston recommended that Metcalf be made a brevet brigadier-general of volunteers for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battle of Guiguinto, P. I., March 29, 1899, at which battle Colonel Metcalf was not present and did not take part.

He had been wounded early in the morning shortly after we began our advance from Maraloa, and had returned from Manila, while the battle of Guiguinto was fought between 5 and 6 o'clock that evening. As soon as the statement appeared in the Associated Press dispatches to the papers of the United States that Metcalf had been brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers for "gallant and meritorious conduct" in the battle of Guiguinto, I took it upon myself to correct the erroneous statement, and to my surprise General Funston claimed in the public press that Metcalf did take part in this battle.

The battle of Maraloa River was fought March 27. The first and third battalions developed considerable fire in front of them. Just before the fire ceased my battalion was ordered on the firing line. We fired a few volleys across the Maraloa River into a clump of bamboos on the other side. On reaching the banks of the river I saw some of our men swimming toward a boat on the north bank. Before they could succeed in getting the boat back to the south bank orders came down the line to stop firing; that the insurgents concealed behind a clump of bamboos in front and to the right of us had raised a white flag.

After the firing had ceased, I found that the men who swam the river were Lieut. H. H. Hardy and Privates Huntsman and Wiley of H company. They, with the assistance of about fifty other boys of the Twentieth Kansas who had stripped off their clothes to go in bathing, succeeded in towing a number of cascoes and rafts across from the north bank of the river and built a pontoon bridge. Colonel Funston with Lieut. Sam Hopkins took about thirty or forty boys of our regiment over on this pontoon bridge and brought back some thirty or thirty-five prisoners who were armed with Remington rifles. I assisted in breaking up these rifles and throwing them into the river. The prisoners were sent back to Manila.

The honor of capturing these prisoners is a question of dispute. The impression I had at the time was that the artilley had compelled the surrender of the Filipinos. This is corroborated by a report of Maj. J. F. Bell of General MacArthur's staff and Major Young of the Utah Battery. Colonel Hawkins of the Tenth Pennsylvania also claimed the honor. In his report (found in part 3, Annual Report of the War Department, 1899), he stated that Lieutenant Coulter of the Tenth Pennsylvania swam the Maraloa River with two or three men and received the surrender of these prisoners and turned them over to Colonel Funston of the Twentieth Kansas.

I know that Funston never swam the Maraloa River, or any other river under fire. He can not swim.

"Albert L. Cross, of Burlington, Vt., who had been in Washington several days this week hoping that an opportunity might be given him to make his statement before the Senate Philippine Committee, was obliged to return home before the informal hearing took place. His statement relative to the case of Father Augustine was presented in the form of an affidavit, which reads in part as follows:

I remember the day the priest came up to camp. He was dressed in the uniform of a sergeant of artillery. I knew he was a priest because I carried his robes up to quarters from the gunboat. He was confined alone in a little room under the officers' quarters. He remained there about nine days. During that time I and another man, by direction and in the presence of Captain Brownell, gave him the "water cure" twice, once about a week after he arrived and the second time the next afternoon. The cure was given for the purpose of getting money which he was supposed to have for the insurgents. Sergeant Campbell was the man who assisted me. That same afternoon I heard some one at headquarters say, "We are going to give it to him again to-night."

About 10 o'clock that night I received an order from Captain Brownell, delivered by Sergeant Campbell, to go over to headquarters—that they were going to "dose the nigger again." I asked to be excused, and he excused me and ordered Private Branch to go with him. The next that happened I saw a squad of prisoners from the window of a house which I was in, near the quarters, coming over. I did not look closely at them. I knew what had happened. I heard them dig a hole on the parade ground, and I knew that they buried the body on the parade ground. In the afternoon, at headquarters, the doctor, Woods, Campbell, and Brownell were talking the matter over, and I said that if the cure was given to him again it would kill him. That was the reason I asked to be excused.

Personally appeared the above Albert L. Cross and made oath that the above statement subscribed by him is true, before me,

JULIAN CODMAN,
Justice of the Peace.

"Daniel J. O'Connor, an enlisted man in the United States Navy, told what he knew about conveying Father Augustine from Iloilo to Banate, where, as is well known, the unfortunate padre was given the water cure three times, which resulted in his death. O'Connor said:

I was a machinist serving on board United States gunboat Paragua. During the month of November, 1900—I have forgotten exact date—Lieut. A. Althouse, United States Navy, commanding officer of the Paragua, gave orders to his engineer crew (I being one of them, as it was my duty to run the engines on the watch from 12 to 4) to have fires and steam ready to get under way at a moment's notice, as he was expecting a very important prisoner on board. Later in the day Lieutenant Althouse ordered the fires banked, as he thought the whole thing had fallen through. Later still in the day I heard him tell Captain Brownell, of the Twenty-sixth United States Infantry, that he would not receive this prisoner on board the ship while he was in command only as a prisoner of war.

About 6 p. m. we again had orders to get up steam to get under way. About dark a closed and guarded carriage drove up to the gang plank of the Paragua. One of the guards opened the carriage, and the important prisoner stepped to the ground, to be immediately hurried on board by pushing him along. He was disguised in the suit of a United States sergeant of artillery. Captain Althouse took charge of him instantly and called for two guards from the crew. The prisoner here opened his coat and told Althouse the clothes he had on were not his uniform, and at the same time showed him his vestments underneath the coat.

He further said he was not a fighter; that he was a man. Pointing to the guards, he said they treated him as though he was an animal, and he asked Althouse for protection. He continued to talk, but Althouse ordered the guards to take him below and under no consideration to permit him to make an outcry until we left the dock, as some one on shore might hear him, and they wanted the expedition to be entirely secret. He further ordered the guards, if necessary, to gag him. I knew the prisoner to be a priest, because I attended services in his church at Molo. Near midnight we weighed anchor and got under way for Banate.

Before going on watch I tried to talk to the priest, first getting permission from one of the guards, the other guard being too drunk to know if I talked to him or not. The priest refused to talk, and I asked him in Spanish if he cared for a drink of water, but he would not answer me—only waved his hands and kept on repeating the beads of the church. He was then in double irons. I went on watch at 12. When I went off watch I again went down in the hold to try to talk to the priest, but I failed to get a word from him. He was praying and the hand irons had been removed. When daylight well set in we arrived at Banate, and Althouse turned the prisoner over to Captain Brownell, who was on board. Brownell took him ashore in one of the ships.

"These are but a few of the many witnesses whose testimony could be had if the committee would open the door to investigation, but who are either unwilling or unable to come to Washington for the purpose of making voluntary statements. Among other cases where grave charges have been made upon the testimony of eyewitnesses are those connecting General Funston, Colonel Metcalf, and Captain Bishop with the killing of prisoners of war after the battle of Caloocan. In the case of Captain Bishop, the report of the inspector strongly indicated his guilt, or, at least, that the evidence against him was sufficiently strong to warrant a court-martial; but no effort was made to bring him to trial, and the investigation was summarily stopped for the astounding reason given in the recommendation of Judge-Advocate Crowder, to whom the matter had been referred by General Otis, that if it were further prosecuted the facts developed would implicate many others.

"As the suppression of this investigation and the reason for it seems to have been entirely satisfactory to the War Department, it is all the more important that there should be an independent investigation by some authority that will not be deterred by a dread of discovering the truth; but the fear that 'the facts developed would implicate many others' seems to be as potent with the Senate committee as it is with the War Department and the military authorities in the Philippine Islands.

"The charge made against General Funston that he had encouraged and connived at the killing of prisoners, though made upon the authority of an Army officer, and though the language imputed to him was said to have been uttered in the presence of witnesses whose names are given, was never investigated at all. On the contrary, the Secretary of War, in dealing with the charges presented by Lieutenant Hall against General Funston, entirely overlooked the specific accusation that he was responsible for the murder of prisoners, and confined his order for investigation to a minor specification.

"It is worthy of note in this connection that while Inspector Mallory was prosecuting the investigation of the charges against Captain Bishop, General Funston expressed to General MacArthur his regret that the charges had ever received official notice, and complained that Mallory's investigation 'was taking so wide a scope,' and that he 'was going into the matter so thoroughly.' It was this very investigation that was stopped because of the fear that it 'would implicate many others' in its 'scope.' It is inevitable that suspicion must ever rest upon those who were most active in discouraging 'a thorough investigation' as being among 'these many others,' even if no specific charges were made against them, and if these suspicions be unjust it is the fault of those who have deliberately protected the real culprits from exposure and punishment.

"The investigation of the charges against Colonel Metcalf was avowedly partial and incomplete. A 'board of officers' was appointed to investigate the charges specified in the Secretary's order. This board asked for further instructions, declaring that many of the witnesses, whose names had been given, were in the United States, to which General Otis replied that it was 'contemplated that the proceedings of the board here would necessarily be partial and incomplete.' This was the character of the investigation upon which the board made its finding 'from the evidence available and before it.' It was an investigation in which the person who made the charges was not permitted to appear, in which there was no cross-examination of witnesses, and in which evidence was taken by affidavit.

"Two of the witnesses in the Philippines, who had made charges over their signatures that they had seen Metcalf kill the prisoners, were subsequently induced to retract or make contrary statements. Such retractions involved, of course, a confession that they had deliberately made a slanderous accusation of a felonious crime against their superior officer. It is a little singular that no proceedings were had against them for this offense, and that one of them is still 'an officer and a gentleman' in the United States Army. If Colonel Metcalf is entirely innocent, it is an outrage that his slanderers should be permitted to wear the uniform of American officers, and a still worse outrage that he should be left with the imperfect vindication of a 'partial and incomplete' investigation.

"The Brownell case calls for a far more thorough and disinterested investigation than it will ever receive from the War Department. As the matter now stands, the entire responsibility for the killing of Father Augustine is laid upon Captain Brownell, who has admitted the charges. It is not right that he should be made a mere scapegoat for others' sins. He, himself, declares that torture was a common practice, and the important fact to be learned is by whose authority it was done. The attempt to shift upon subordinate officers and soldiers the responsibility for such practices is an attempt to besmirch the honor of the rank and file to save the reputation of their commanding officers.

"In the case of Captain Brownell it is absurd to suppose that he, a mere captain in the volunteer service, had authority to use a gunboat of the United States Navy, and to deprive General Hughes of the services of his interpreter without his knowledge or permission. Would it not be in the interest of a fuller knowledge of the truth to summon Lieutenant Althouse, of the United States Navy, to explain his part in this affair, and to state under whose authority he was acting? Would it not be well to recall General Hughes to testify as to what he knows about the case, and to state why he dismissed the matter with only a superficial examination last May?

"Would it not be well to have Major Glenn before the committee to reveal some of the knowledge, some intimations of which we have received in the newspaper reports of his recent trial? What did he mean when he charged his commanding officers with authorizing the acts of cruelty of which he was accused? What is the real truth with respect to his accusation that the official records of Smith's brigade had been tampered with and changed? Is it a fact that Smith doomed several thousand people to death by starvation after they had become friendly to the United States?

"There are other witnesses whose names have been long before the committee whose testimony should be heard. Mr. Robert M. Collins, a representative of the Associated Press, in a letter over his own signature, tells of an interview between himself and Messrs. Davis and Bass, representatives of the New York Sun and Harpers' Weekly on the one hand, and General Otis on the other. In this interview they told General Otis that they themselves had seen wounded prisoners murdered, various incidents such as innocent Filipinos ruthlessly shot down for attempting to run from arrest at a cock fight, and a perfect orgy of looting and wanton destruction of property. According to this statement General Otis made no denial, but no man was punished.

"These men are responsible correspondents, whose names have been before the committee, and their testimony ought to be heard. Mr. Stephen Bonsal, the correspondent of the Boston Transcript, who was in Samar, declared that the only prisoners taken, so far as he had heard, were taken by Waller's command, and he had heard him criticised by the highest officers for doing so. Let Mr. Bonsal be brought before the committe and questioned as to his own knowledge, and especially as to the identity of these 'highest officers' who censured Waller for not murdering his prisoners.

"A Republican Congressman, who personally visited the Philippines, is quoted in the Boston Transcript as saying that in northern Luzon no prisoners were taken, but that wherever a male Filipino could be found he was killed. It is believed that the Congressman who made this statement can be identified, and his testimony should be heard before the committee.

"Mr. Joseph Ohl, of the Atlanta Constitution, personally visited the islands and gave a terrible account of the burning of towns and villages, the desolation of the country, and the cruelties practiced upon the inhabitants. Let Mr. Ohl's testimony be heard. No suggestion has been made for hearing the testimony of Filipinos themselves, some of whom in common fairness should be permitted to tell their side of the story; but waiving this, there are enough American witnesses who have ample means of knowledge, who could do much to enlighten the American people as to the practical operation of our Philippine policy.

"Finally, let General Miles be asked to appear before the committee and tell what he has personally seen and heard with respect to the 'marked severities,' for which expression he was so sharply rebuked by the Secretary of War. Although the President himself, in his recent message, admits these marked severities by attributing the prevailing famine largely to the devastation of war, it will be both interesting and instructive to have a particular account of the character and extent of this devastation by an experienced commander who has been on the scene and who, it is believed, would not be deterred from telling the plain truth by fear of incurring the displeasure of the Administration."

Mr. MCENERY. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] said that the bill now pending before the Senate is in his opinion the most important or one of the most important which has been presented for the consideration of this Congress. In my opinion it will be, if it passes, one of the most disastrous to a great many valuable interests in the United States. It will not be confined to the interest of sugar, but to rice and to cotton and to lumber, because it means that eventually there will be free trade between the United States and the Philippine Islands, and not only there, but with every other portion of the habitable globe. It is a scheme worked up by the sugar trust of the United States in order to get control of the sugar market of the world. They intend to do it this way: By destroying the beet-sugar industry in the United States and elsewhere and controlling the entire output of the product of cane in the Philippines, in Cuba, and in the West India Islands. If that scheme is carried out, in less than twenty-five years there would not be a single beet-sugar factory in the United States and there would not be a single cane factory in the United States. There would only be the larger refineries of the sugar trust, and there would be a duty on refined sugar.

Mr. President, I do not think we are under any obligations to these newly acquired territories. They are foreign territory, or at least, except in the case of Porto Rico, they are treated as such. And if so, where is the obligation upon the people of the United States to build up the industries in the Philippines, and you may say in Cuba, in order to destroy great and valued interests in the United States? There is no humanity in this. Our course and our conduct toward the people in the Philippine Islands have been such that to say it is a question of humanity to relieve them by oppressing our people is inconsistent. Our Army has been among them oppressing them as no people have ever been oppressed before. And I do not say this in condemnation of the Army. It was there, under the policy of this Government, placed among a class of people whose dignity had been insulted, whose religious faith had been impeached; among a people among whom strangers had been sent as teachers, altogether an alien government placed among them. Necessarily their savage instincts were aroused, and there were outrages, and it was nothing more than human nature that the Army should retaliate.

The Government of the United States, the people of the United States are responsible for the acts committed in those islands by the Army. Therefore I say it is absolutely inconsistent to appeal now on the basis of humanity to reduce the duties on imports from the Philippine Islands in order to relieve the distress in those islands when we ourselves have been oppressing those people in a manner almost beyond belief.

In my opinion, our course toward those people ought to be one of kindness and consideration. We should treat them as they are now treated—as a foreign people under our protection, but as a nationality. The Almighty never intended that this people should go there and dispossess the Filipinos of their country. He never intended that the Spanish should go there and dispossess them; and they were sent away and would have been sent away long before our Army was successful had there been no intervention on the part of the United States. The Almighty has selected places of abode for every nationality. He has marked the boundaries of their abode by the ocean, by mountains, by rivers, and no nation has ever passed its natural boundaries unless in course of time it has been driven back.

It is well enough, Mr. President, to look at the magnitude of the industries which will be affected if this bill becomes a law and there is an introduction of sugar into this country at reduced rates from the Philippine Islands. Take cane sugar, for instance. In Louisiana in the year 1823 there were 15,401 tons only produced. In the year 1900 there were 270,338 tons, each of 2,240 pounds. In the State of Texas the cane industry has reached 40 factories in a rich producing section of country.

Now, under the Dingley Act, in which there was a promise to the people of the United States of protection and an assurance that if they invested their money under the provisions of that act they would be protected, the increase in the production of sugar has been simply marvelous.

There are to-day in Louisiana 1,500,000 people who are directly or indirectly interested in the cane-sugar industry. Under the existing tariff the cane-sugar industry has prospered. Under the same protection, if continued, and there is no agitation for the reduction of the tariff on sugar, frightening capitalists and preventing investments, Louisiana alone, if all the land available for the cultivation of cane is utilized, could supply one-half the sugar consumed in the United States. In 1880 there were 4 establishments in the State manufacturing sugar, with a capital of $385,000. In 1890 the number had increased to 38, with a capital of $1,943,000. In 1900 they had increased to 384, with a capital of $52,709,105, showing an increase of capital of $50,000,000. The sugar factories and mills employ, exclusively of those engaged in plantation work, 6,504 wage-earners. So the statement with respect to the rapid increase in the industry in the last few years is not exaggerated.

Both are interested. The cane and the beet-sugar interest is essential to the farming interest. Now, look at the rapid increase in the beet-sugar industry:

UNITED STATES BEET-SUGAR CROP OF 1901.

[From Senate Document No. 316, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.]

Acres in beets		175,083
Sugar produced	pounds..	369,211,733
Value of same, at 5 cents per pound		$18,460,586.65
Increase in production in ten years	per cent..	3,452

Now, that brings into the cultivation of the beet and the manufacture of sugar from it:

Tons of coal used	210,229
Cost of coal	$630,687
Cost of fuel oil	$234,327
Tons of limestone used	163,322
Cost of limestone	$326,644
Factory laborers employed	8,762
Total paid for labor	$1,166,602
Average daily wage rate	$2.16
Tons of beets worked	1,685,688
Paid farmers for beets	$7,585,599
Number of factories, 1902	51
Investment in factories	$48,000,000

States in which factories are located: Michigan, New York, Colorado, Utah, Nebraska, California, Minnesota, Ohio, Wisconsin, Washington, Oregon.

This item alone, the sugar produced from cane and from beets, is worth more to the United States than the entire Philippine Islands. There is a greater area of arable land and there are greater prospects for the future; because if this protection is continued, there are 23 States in the Union which will produce the beet from which sugar can be made, enough to supply the demand of the world.

Not only that, but it adds greatly to the value of plantations and farming lands, it increases the production of cattle, and in every way adds to the material interests and prosperity of the country.

Then there are the tobacco interests, which are vast throughout the United States. You can hardly measure them by figures. Let everyone just think for a moment that in every hamlet and in every village in the United States there is a cigar factory.

Then there is the rice industry. A few years ago this country had to import nearly all of the rice which it consumed, the amount raised in Georgia, let me say, hardly entering into the item of consumption. But now the vast areas of rice culture in Louisiana and in Texas, added to the production of the rice fields of Georgia and South Carolina, have absolutely increased to such an extent as to make a surplus in the rice crop of the United States.

It is the intention to increase the production of rice in the Philippines because it can be produced by cheap labor, and bring it over the Northern Pacific Railroad, and distribute it through the North, and thus destroy this great and this important and this growing interest in the United States.

There are millions of dollars alone invested in canals, pumps, and rice mills, all for the purpose of placing rice before the people of the United States in a finished condition equal to that which is brought from Japan or from any other portion of the world.

I say it is the intention of the sugar trust to use all of its capital, all of its energies, and all of its power to break down the sugar industry in the United States, to break it down in Germany, in Hungary, in France, in Belgium, everywhere in the world, and build up this great industry in Cuba, and in other West India islands, and in the Philippines and control the sugar output of the world. They will control every pound of sugar raised in Cuba, in the Philippines, or any other possession which this Government may obtain in the Tropics.

What will then be the condition of the people in the United States? These millions of dollars swept away, these great factories in the West destroyed, those 300 factories in Louisiana destroyed. One million five hundred thousand people are said to be engaged in the beet-sugar industry. One million five hundred thousand people are said to be engaged in the sugar industry in Louisiana or indirectly benefited by it. These people are to be impoverished and destroyed in order that a gigantic corporation can live, and not only live, but grow to still greater power and strength and influence, and dictate a policy to the people of the United States.

They have done it. On more than one occasion it has brought scandal upon the Congress of the United States. Senators have had to rise in their seats in this body and make an explanation of charges against them. I do not say that they were true, but it shows the overshadowing strength and greatness of these great corporations, when even its shadow over the capital of this country can exert such a baneful influence as to create the impression that honest men, honorable men, can fall under its influence and under its power.

Our Democratic friends seem to think it is Democratic policy to advocate a reduction of duties on sugar from the Philippines. If it were a reduction all along the line of the tariff wherever it was necessary, there might be some consistency in the advocacy of this reduction. But there never was a more un-Democratic measure. I understand the Democratic doctrine to be equality among all and special privileges to none. But here we are given special privileges all along the tariff line and exempting others. Not only that, it is aiding and assisting one of the most powerful trusts now existing in the world.

The Republican party promised protection to the sugar interests in this country. Under that promise and under the law enacted under the declaration in their platforms, our people invested large sums of money. Men, too, have imperiled their political reputations and their political future on promises, not only from Republican platforms, but from the Republican leaders. These have been broken and are to be broken in the enactment of this law.

What were these promises? From the Chief Executive down, there was no intention to ever incorporate the people of the Philippine Islands into the inhabitants of the United States, nor was it the intention to make them an integral part of the United States. When the treaty with Spain was in jeopardy and there was a desire and a great anxiety that there should be no extra session of the Senate to ratify it, what was the declaration that induced men to vote for the ratification of that treaty? It was that the Philippine Islands should never become a part of this country. It was that none of the products of that country should come here and interfere with American industries. Where is that promise now? It lies broken in this proposed enactment. Where are the promises in the Republican platform? They, too, lie broken and scattered in this proposed enactment. Is that just? Is it right? Even if there were no interests immediately jeopardized, the breaking of solemn, political faith, promises, and pledges can not be justified.

Is it right, Mr. President, that the people of the United States should be destroyed, should be impoverished and beggared under a false sentiment of humanity for a foreign people to whom they are under no obligations whatever? Is it right that a trust should go out in every part of the United States and destroy every industry which it is to its interest to destroy, and carry ruin, distress, and desolation into every home?

This is no fancy picture. It is being enacted to-day. There are people in Louisiana who are being broken up. There are people there to-day who are engaged in this industry, which had prospered under the promises of the Republican party. They have abandoned their magnificent plantations, or are trying at least to make some other use of them, and some have gone abroad in order to find a home and a place of refuge from this distress.

That is un-American. I believe in the protective policy as much as any Republican in this Chamber. I believe in it to-day; and if the vote were to come to-day I would be found with those who are willing to protect not only the infant industries of the country, but to keep from destruction those industries which are already established. So sincerely is my faith in that belief that among a Democratic constituency, many of whom are free traders, when they heard my defense, to a man they applauded and unanimously returned me to the Senate. But I believe in associating with protectionists who are protectionists, men who will keep their pledges, not only to me, but to the people of the United States.

There is no legal question to be argued on this bill. It is a question of obligation whether you are going to aid and help a foreign people to destroy our own people.

Now, what are you building up? The sugar trust. I do not propose to discuss the Cuban treaty. We will commence with Porto Rico. With 40,000 tons of sugar when we acquired that country, greater increase beyond 15 or 20 per cent by the introduction of improved machinery was promised. When the tariff was taken off the promise was made to the beet-sugar people by the Committee on the Philippines of the House of Representatives, which is on record, "You will have nothing to fear in the future; we will make a distinction between Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands; Cuba will be independent; this is not to be a precedent." That was in the report of the committee of the House of Representatives, a majority of whom were protectionist Republicans.

Now, look at the vast increase in the production of sugar in Porto Rico. It is not enough, left by itself, to affect the sugar industries in the United States. But go to Cuba. They are raising more cane and manufacturing more sugar than ever before in the history of that island, and not one-tenth of the productive capacity of the island has been brought into existence. When that shall have been done under the operation of the New York and English capitalists and the Cuban Company, when those millions upon millions of acres shall have been purchased and brought under cultivation, added to what will be brought from the Philippine Islands, there will be a wave of distress from the West, from the North, and from the South, for that will destroy, in my opinion, the best industry that was ever encouraged and protected—the cane and beet sugar industry in this country.

Now, let us see as to the Philippine Islands what is the future. I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 351, December 17, 1901. In the debate in the House Mr. GROSVENOR said:

My question is this: Would the gentleman from Virginia think of putting tobacco of the Philippines, produced as it would be by the cheap labor of that country, on an exact equality in the markets of the United States with the production of the same article by the higher labor of the American laborer? When he answers that question he will be talking about something that is at issue and not about something that has passed away in the rear.

As to sugar, rice, and tobacco—are you willing to bring those articles here and put them on the market in competition with the same articles raised by honest American labor?

Mr. DALZELL, a splendid authority, too, said:

If you gentlemen on the other side are not for this bill you are for free trade—free trade with the Philippine Islands; free trade against the interest of the tobacco raiser of the county of Lancaster in my own State of Pennsylvania and against every other tobacco raiser, and in favor of the tobacco raisers by cheap labor in the Philippine Islands; free trade against the interests of the rice grower of the United States, and the sugar grower, and in favor of the rice grower and the sugar grower in the Philippine Islands; free trade against the interests of that army of cigar makers in this country, so as to bring in, duty free, the cheap-made cigars of the cheap labor of the Philippine Islands.

Now, what do they demand to bring about the production of sugar, rice, and tobacco so as to enter the United States? They demand in the Philippine Islands cheap labor. Here is what their chamber of commerce said, one of the demands which they make:

For the immediate passage of laws for the demand of cooly labor, as the native labor is inadequate and insufficient for the development of the resources of the islands.

That is what they demand of the Congress of the United States, and I expect they will eventually get it.

Then we have Mr. Brewster Cameron's mission to Washington. He came here from the Philippine Islands, and the object of his mission was to obtain "an amendment to the present Chinese-exclusion law, so that the Philippine Commission will be empowered to admit labor from China under such restrictions as may be deemed advisable."

That Mr. Cameron can speak in Washington as one with authority is assured by the fact that he represents the three chambers of commerce in Manila.

That is an extract taken from the Manila Times of October 28, 1902.

Now, what are the capacities of that island?

They are universally acknowledged to be the richest islands in the East. The advantages of their soil and climate for raising sugar are said to exceed those of Hawaii by fully 30 per cent. Their timber is unexcelled. They hold a monopoly of the best grades of hemp; and for many other agricultural products, such as corn and cotton, they have displayed an amazing adaptability.

Here is what Carman & Co. say:

It seems to me the labor question in these islands resolves itself into one of development or stagnation.

It is, I think, generally admitted that at least for a few years to come the natives can not do the work required to place the country even where it was before hostilities began.

If it is considered to the advantage of the Filipinos to cultivate the land and inaugurate industries which will place them in the forefront of oriental civilization, then the only labor that can accomplish these results should be permitted to come and temporarily remain. Only laborers should be admitted, and their return to China should be guaranteed.

Then, again, the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation say:

We do not care to discuss the currency question, but we can most heartily indorse any action which has for its object the introduction of Chinese labor.

La Puerta del sol: I want to see the monetary question fixed on a basis so as to avoid any fluctuations in exchange.

I am inclined to the free entry of Chinese into these islands, but I would stipulate that they enter as laborers for agriculture and as day laborers, but under no circumstances should they be allowed to devote themselves to commerce.

That is the whole of the testimony, and the statements that Chinese labor is the first consideration; in other words, they want cheap labor for agricultural purposes, for raising tobacco, sugar, and rice. They are going to get cheap labor, and they are going to bring this into the United States, if this bill passes. They are going to destroy these American industries, produced by honest American labor.

Now, what will be the capacity of those islands for sugar when it is produced there under scientific cultivation?

[From Monthly Summary of Commerce of the Philippine Islands, issue of October, 1901, Division of Insular Affairs.]

SUGAR.

Page 309: The average production from sugar cane in the islands an acre is about 1½ tons. In Hawaii it has, in some instances, reached 11 tons. There is a profit for the producer of about $80 Mexican a ton, so that while the grower in Hawaii is making his $880 an acre, the Filipino farmer has about $120 profit.

Page 310: The grower does not take any pains in cultivating the plant. He lets it grow wild, and the only time he shows any interest is when harvest time comes.

SUGAR.

Page 419: The large estates of Luzon and Negros possess nothing but the most antiquated machinery. Yet even with these sugar is grown to advantage and marketed at a profit.

Our cotton friends in the South have an idea that there is a great future for cotton in the Philippine Islands. I have always contended that those islands are equal in soil and climate for the production of cotton to Georgia, northern Louisiana, or any other cotton-producing State. Here is the evidence on that point:

COTTON.

Page 533: Experiments in growing cotton from seed procured in the United States have been made in the province of Davao in Mindanao with such success that the culture of cotton will be tested fully, and if the results prove as successful as the persons interested in the trial believe, the consequences will be far-reaching in their effect upon the future cotton trade of the Orient.

SUGAR.

Page 766: According to the figures given above sugar can be made in the Philippines at about one-third the cost of Hawaiian sugar, an item of considerable importance.

The sugar estates are as a rule quite small, the mills in many instances primitive concerns consisting of two cylinders rotated by buffalo power, the process of manufacture is of the crudest and is poorly conducted, and as a consequence the raw sugar is necessarily of inferior grade. The transportation to market is made over rough roads by means of bullock carts.

Now, as to rice, Professor Worcester, in his book, speaks as follows of the rice product:

Rice is the staple food of the common people, and they are quite successful in raising it. In former years considerable quantities of it were exported to China, but at present the crop is insufficient for home consumption.

The methods used in rice culture and harvest are of the crudest. The ground is prepared for macan by flooding it and working it with muck rakes drawn by carabaos. The young rice shoots are stuck in by hand. The ripe heads of grain are often cut, one at a time, with a small knife blade, though sickles are sometimes used. Thrashing is usually accomplished under the feet of women or cattle, more rarely by means of wooden flails. The grain is freed from the husk by pounding in a wooden mortar (pilon), and flat baskets are used for winnowing. Very rarely one finds simple homemade machinery for pounding or winnowing, but there is nothing of the sort in general use.

Rice was being harvested in large quantities, and we were much interested in watching the primitive methods employed. The only implement used by the reapers was a small knife, with which they cut the heads of grain from the stalks one at a time.

I think it is well understood by rice-growing people that the possibilities for rice culture in the Philippine Islands are almost beyond calculation, and when improved methods of culture are carried there and the full capacity of the land extracted the rice produced by cheap labor in the Philippines will be brought here and will be sold and will compete with the rice industry of Georgia, South Carolina, Louisiana, and Texas.

In a circular of the Division of Botany, issued by the Department of Agriculture, is found the following:

One of the most important food products of the archipelago is rice. The grain forms the staple food not only of the native population but also of the numerous Chinese inhabitants. Owing to its general use, a scarcity of rice always causes great hardship to the people of the islands.

* * * * * * *

The annual production of rice in the Philippines averages about 17,000,000 cavans (36,000,000 bushels).

CULTIVATION OF SUGAR.

Page 11: The situation is very different now from what it was when your correspondent first arrived in the country in 1898. At that time the sugar plantations were at a standstill, owing to the war, and sugar crops were permitted to decay on the ground, because no one harvested the rich products. Hundreds of sugar mills were burned by the fighting armies. The walls of these sugar mills may still be seen standing, and in many cases the native owners have rebuilt on the remnants of stone-wall work. The machinery in most cases is ruined by the burning or by the exposure to the elements.

SUGAR CULTURE CAPABLE OF EXTENSION.

Page 12: In order to give your readers an idea of the sugar industrial situation in the islands, it will be necessary to begin at the beginning. Your correspondent had the opportunity of visiting the principal sugar districts on Luzon, Panay, Negros, and Cebu islands during the years 1898, 1899, and 1900. In most instances the sugar plantations were idle. Vast fields were unworked because there was no encouragement for the Filipino to operate his plantation only to have the crops seized by the insurgents or destroyed in the process of war.

In conversation with managers of the plantations as regards finances, I was informed that the costs of sugar production were lower than in Cuba. The difference in freight rates, however, on raw sugar from the Philippines to this country of course bars the product from competition with Cuban and Hawaiian products. Notwithstanding this, considerable sugar is being produced in the islands for export to America. The facilities for working the plantations in the Philippines are more favorable than formerly, and this tends to extend the markets for consumption. The soil is excellent for the cultivation of the sugar crop, and vast tracts may be seen producing crops. The extensive destruction of crops and sugar refineries which occurred during the troublesome times of the past few years has nearly ceased, and one may see many workmen restoring buildings and planting new crops. The work at the plantations is carried on in very crude fashion. The big water buffalo is employed to haul a wood-pointed plow through the soil, and two or more natives guide the plow, and they make hard work of it.

A few American plows for these plantations would be very acceptable There are no shovels, hoes, picks, or other tools available, and the natives may be seen by the dozens on their hands and knees turning and preparing the soil with their hands or with little bamboo sticks. Sometimes they have iron bars made from wheel tires. They use a "bolo" knife to advantage in this work. The crop is cared for on the same crude plan. Machinery for farming purposes is not available, although I understand that there has been a good call for it since Americans began buying these sugar plantations and cultivating them.

One of the advantages possessed by the Filipino sugar planter is that he can hire help very cheaply. The average farm hand will work for 10 cents per day and board himself. Native boys may be hired still cheaper. The Chinese coolies overrun the farming sections, and they are first-rate laborers, steady and reliable, working for about 8 cents per day. American soldiers who have been discharged in the islands and who are familiar with plantation work are securing positions as foremen on the sugar plantations, receiving from $2 to $4 per day for their services. It pays the rich native sugar mill and plantation owner to have two or three superintendents or foremen who are Americans, for then better protection is assured and also means introduced for the improving of the plant by putting in American machinery. Many of these sugar planters own extensive properties and mills, but lack the knowledge of how to work them according to modern ideas. You will find rich plantations operated with crude devices and large refineries with old-fashioned machinery of the crudest sort, mostly operated by hand or animal power. The American foreman immediately improves things by ordering a steam-power plant from the United States. He then invests a few thousand dollars in modern sugar-working machinery, and in a few months has the plant well equipped for the making of a good product of sugar.

Now, just consider the idea of sugar being raised there on wages from 8 to 10 cents a day and that sugar brought here under this bill, if it becomes a law, with the tariff taken off, practically put down here free, coming in competition with the American beet-sugar farmers, with the labor on their sugar plantations in Texas, in Louisiana, and in Florida, and with the vast number of skilled workmen who are employed in and around the factories. Let us see how the tobacco interests will be affected.

TOBACCO.

[From vol. 2, Agriculture, U. S. Census, 1900, p. 526.]

Value of cigars and cigarettes, 56.6 of total value of all tobacco manufactures.

Chewing, smoking, and snuff not included above, nor tobacco stemming.

With free cigars from Manila and Cuba, what is going to become of these vast interests? These millions and hundreds of millions of dollars in the various tobacco interests, employing several hundred thousand people, will be annihilated. These interests can not exist with cigars made by labor at 8 and 10 cents a day.

By looking at the statistics—and I had them here, but have mislaid them for the moment—you will find that cigars are manufactured so cheaply in Manila that under no possible conditions could the cigar makers in this country compete with them; nor could they compete with Cuban cigars if the tariff were taken off of cigars from that country.

Recurring again to the cane-sugar industry, I want to refer to volume 2, United States Agricultural Census for 1900, page 467, which does not include Hawaii:

Number of farms	181,382
Acres in cane	386,986
Farm value of cane	$20,541,636
Total investment in industry	$100,030,000
1901 crop, tons	310,000
Value of crop at 5 cents per pound	$34,720,000

States producing: Louisiana, Alabama, Georgia, Texas, Florida, Mississippi, South Carolina, Arkansas, Arizona, Indian Territory, North Carolina, and New Mexico.

Now we will take up the rice industry and see what a tremendous industry that is. A great many States are interested in it.

I have gone all over tables of the great sugar, tobacco, and the rice industry, every one of which will be annihilated if this bill becomes a law, not by the effect of this bill alone, but the consequences which will follow its enactment. It is the entering wedge, and I say to the Republicans in this Senate that it means free trade and nothing else. It started with reciprocity, and reciprocity is free trade and means nothing else. That is according to my reading of all economic works on that subject.

We have already heard it said in this Chamber that the Republicans will look out for a revision of the tariff at the next session of Congress. That means that these great corporations, these great trusts, which want the tariff taken off of certain articles will have it taken off, and those great trusts which want the tariff kept on certain articles will have it kept on those articles. The sugar trust demands free sugar from all the tropical countries of the world. It demands the destruction of the beet-sugar interest in the United States and the beet-sugar interest in all other parts of the world, and it is going to have it, unless it is checked at once in the beginning of its campaign of aggression. They do not stop at anything. Men to them are nothing. Individual interests amount to nothing. It is a Juggernaut car that rides over everything and everybody, and crushes everything that gets beneath its wheels. When a revision is made you will find free trade at one end of the line and protection at the other. I do not believe in that.

As I stated in a speech which I delivered in 1897 on the Dingley bill, I believe in an honest, fair, square protection to every interest and to every section of the country with impartiality, and we thought we got it. We thought we had it on a basis where there was some degree at least of equality. But that equality is now being destroyed. Certain items are being taken off which are demanded by certain trusts, and certain other items are being kept on which are required to be kept on by the trusts.

I read from a protest of the domestic sugar producers against any further reduction of the sugar from the Philippines.

Even when the Government had a "surplus" in the Treasury that menaced the welfare of the country, which it became the policy of Mr. McKinley and others to reduce by making sugar "free," he remained loyal to domestic sugar production, and to develop it Congress granted it a bounty of from 1½ to 2½ cents a pound in 1890.

The Dingley law granted it similar if lesser protection, to enact which the friends of domestic sugar in the Senate—after proposing a small bounty in addition to the Dingley rates—gave way in order that the act might the more speedily become a law to enable other American industries to reap an earlier revival. Then it was that a leading Republican Senator, who had offered and secured a favorable report from committee on the bounty amendment, said and promised:

"Mr. President, the Republican party on this side of the Chamber is for an adequate protection to the beet-sugar industry. It stands to-day, as it will stand at the first available opportunity, for the passage of a law that will give the beet-sugar producers of my State fair and reasonable protection against 'free' importation from the Hawaiian Islands. The Republican party on this side of the Chamber stands ready to meet that issue, but it does not dare—in view of the greater interests of the whole country—delay the passage of this bill another month in order to settle the question now. In good time, and in ample time to have the provision go into effect as soon as it would by the terms of the amendment of my colleague, the Republicans in this Chamber, in my judgment, will act favorably upon this question."

Everyone knows how that proposition was made there, after the present sugar schedule was adopted.

Asking for no more than was conceded to be just, what has been done in fulfillment of that promise? Worse than nothing!

Then came the Spanish-American war, and under the cry of necessity Hawaii was swept for all time into the "free" sugar column. Following which came free sugar from Porto Rico, in the face of the earnest protests of domestic sugar producers, who were facing the whole of Europe!

Our home sugar producers, struggling under all the agricultural and other disadvantages incident to the development of any new industry, were told that the then small product of Porto Rico (40,000 tons) would not hurt, and in House report 249, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, it was stated in answer to the fear then expressed by our producers that the Porto Rico bill would be taken as a precedent for like legislation in favor of the Philippines, that the proposed legislation established no precedent. They were further told that—

"On the contrary, we (the committee) expressly assert the right to discriminate between Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands and the United States. Cuba is to have a government of its own and there is no menace to the beet-sugar industry from that quarter."

That is what was said to them in the House of Representatives when the tariff bill was before the House.

How stands it to-day? The "menace" in less than two years is thrust forward by the party that thus and then sought to quiet the fears of our sugar producers by the language quoted and by the following implied promise:

"Surely the party which had the courage to provide adequate (?) protection in 1897 for this new industry can be safely trusted to foster it now that it has passed beyond the stage of experiment and is an assured success."

An assured success, forsooth! Will it be with Congress pounding it into the earth?

The legislation for Porto Rico seems to have gone forward partly upon the theory that there was plenty of room in the United States for more "free" sugar.

When before was that theory ever advanced by protectionists? To what other article besides sugar was it ever applied?

If it is to be accepted as sound doctrine, as well apply it—

To silk goods, of which we import	$32,600,000
To cotton goods, of which we import	44,100,000
To iron and steel, of which we import	27,100,000
To wool, manufactures of, of which we import	17,300,000
To glassware, of which we import	6,000,000

And why not ratify the French treaty that lets in at reduced rates jewelry, knit goods, and pottery? And why allow the Argentina wool treaty to lapse? And why not pass the Newfoundland treaty?

These are very pertinent questions, because they show that there is a good deal of sectionalism in this bill—the manufacturing interests of the East against the agricultural interests of the West, the manufacturer against the farmer. Why not ratify the Newfoundland treaty and the French treaty and make a reduction all along the line on those goods which the people demand? Why not reduce the duty upon dried fish, which the people consume and want, and which in some instances it is absolutely necessary for them to have in order to maintain their existence? I am speaking of this manufacturing and sectional war against the interests of the beet-sugar interest of the West. We of the South know that we are too insignificant to receive any consideration from the people of the East. If it were not for the beet-sugar people and the interests they have, we would have been crushed long since.

And here let me say that the people of Louisiana have long known and believed that their industry depended finally upon the beet-sugar interest of the West; that if it were destroyed it would be destroyed by the increasing production of beet sugar, because it can be made cheaper than cane sugar and the area of production is greater, and under protection it was likely to produce such quantities as to meet all domestic demand. But they raised no objection. They interposed no objection to the great increase in the beet-sugar production of the West. They encouraged it and joined with them hand in hand in every effort they made in order to get protection for the beet-sugar interests, even when it was proposed to give the beet-sugar people a bounty in addition to the present tariff. There was never a word of objection from the cane-sugar people. "It is not going to hurt us," they said, "and if it is going to help you, it is all right. We are willing to take our chances in the future. If we are destroyed, we want to be destroyed by American energy and by American enterprise. We do not want to be destroyed by foreign labor, by foreign energy, and foreign enterprise. Our hearts are American, and if we go down under the strong blows of American energy and American enterprise we will shout for glory that it is a stroke of great American industry and of great American enterprise."

I wish to say, in conclusion, that the policy we have adopted toward our colonies I do not think has had so much to do with the weakness of the Monroe doctrine as the absolute cupidity and avarice of the mercantile communities of the country. They care nothing about it, provided they can get established law and order in a place and find trade there. They have long believed that if Germany could get a foothold in South America there would be greater advantages for American trade and American commerce.

It has been said that the German guns on the coast of Venezuela were blowing to pieces the Monroe doctrine, but in my opinion it is the avarice and cupidity of the American capitalists who want to get a foothold abroad, in stable communities, among a people who are not so fond of Americans, and they think that German enterprise and German energy could go there and accomplish such results.

Here is an interview with a New York salesman, who has been traveling in South America, that confirms what I say about the matter. His name is W. C. Percy. He represents a large New York wholesale house, so it is said. This interview I find in a New Orleans paper, the Daily States. He says:

The queerest condition I observed was that the Germans who live there and who are in business were one and all opposed to the steps Germany took to force Venezuela to pay a comparatively trifling sum of money, he began. The trouble was precipitated by a German syndicate of half a dozen men who had a railroad franchise, but were not in anywise interested in the trade or commerce that their fellow-German citizens had spent a lifetime in building up all about them. The best German citizens down there believe that the Kaiser wanted to show off a little before the powers of the world and took the first occasion to do so. But instead of doing his subjects in that half-civilized place a favor he actually did them a great injury, for whereas they formerly controlled the great bulk of the commerce in Venezuela, in the future they will have difficulty in obtaining even the smallest share. In fact, he has ruined many of the most prosperous merchants and bankers that owed him allegiance. And as for the railroad franchise that caused all this trouble, it did not represent any investment of importance.

But the natives hate the Americans about as badly as they could hate anything in this world. Just let one of them get filled up with bad liquor and he immediately begins to curse and abuse some American. Their great statesman, Bolivar, once said, "America for the Americans," but they have changed that statement now and say "America for North Americans," is the way we are trying to construe the Monroe doctrine.

And let me say that I, in common with many other Americans—who have recently been traveling through Venezuela and the other Spanish-American countries, do not have much respect for the Monroe doctrine. I believe that it would be far better for the United States were every foot of Central America and South America owned and controlled by the Germans, English, French, Russians, Italians, or anybody rather than by the mongrel hordes who people them now. There is in reality no such thing as civilization in Venezuela, for instance, as we understand the term here. There is no such thing as morality in their social structure.

Of course he has reference to commercial travelers—

Their priesthood is rotten to the core. The admixture of the negro and Indian blood everywhere has ruined the once proud Spanish peoples. The inhabitants are no farther advanced in any respect than they were a century ago. There are old men and women in many of the Central and South American countries who never wore a hat, who never wore a pair of shoes, and do not know what underclothing is. What good is it to try and cultivate trade with such people? Why, do you know the amount of commerce we have with Canada is five times greater than all that we have with Central and South America combined, which boasts 40,000,000 people? Such is a fact, nevertheless.

Now, let us get down to facts. What good is the Monroe doctrine to us? There is not an American who wants to see the United States take hold of the Central American countries, to see the United States annex any of the Central American territory. We don't want their lands. Then is it not better to allow it to be controlled by the European nations who will civilize it, who will advance it in every way? If it is left in the hands of the natives there it will be just the same at the end of another century that it is to-day. Then why not let the European nations take hold of it, divide it up, and make something of all that rich country. The resources and possibilities are great. But it will take a master hand to accomplish anything substantial there.

But even if the European countries should take hold of those countries, what would they do? To an American who has traveled through the islands that England controls and over which she has established firm governments, he would naturally come to the conclusion that the blight of the African has ruined all that firm government has established. On the islands of Trinidad, Jamaica, Santa Lucia, Barbados, and Grenada the English require by all their laws absolute social equality between the whites and blacks. They marry and intermarry. The blackest of negro men go over to England and after they are educated marry the prettiest blue-eyed girls and bring them back to the islands to live, and generations of yellow people are growing up who look down upon the blacks and who can not expect to be considered as whites, despite all the laws.

I did not read it especially for that purpose, but it shows that the commercial spirit that has carried our armies to the Philippines, making us an aggressive people, wishes to take in everything we can put our hands upon. It makes us violate our most sacred pledges, as we have done in violation of the Teller pledge, that the Spanish war was not one of aggression. But it commenced. What will be its end? There were means immediately adopted in order to bring about the possession of those countries which we had declared we should not meddle with.

I say, Mr. President, it is time now for the American people to check this violation. It is time for the American people to stop this continuous violation of the traditions of the country, and let us stay at home and develop what we have, and put out into waste lands the money that we spend in the Philippines and elsewhere, and for half the money we will build up a country that will sustain a population of 40,000,000 people.

Mr. KEAN and others. Let us vote.

Mr. ALDRICH. Question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. HEITFELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to have the committee amendments considered first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 2, after the word "that," strike out the word "upon."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to amend the second amendment by inserting after the word "sugar" the words "cigars, cigarettes." That is an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, page 2, line 4, after the word "archipelago," insert:

shall hereafter be admitted free of duty, except sugar and tobacco, manufactured and unmanufactured, upon which

It is proposed to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "sugar," in line 5, "cigars, cigarettes."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 25, before the words "per centum," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That all articles the growth and product of the Philippine Archipelago coming into the United States from the Philippine Archipelago shall hereafter be admitted free of duty, except sugar, cigars, cigarettes, and tobacco, manufactured and unmanufactured, upon which there shall be levied, collected, and paid only 50 per cent of the rates of duty aforesaid.

Mr. FORAKER. To that amendment I object.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What does the Senator say?

Mr. FORAKER. I object to that amendment being agreed to. I understand that the amendment now pending is to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty," thereby increasing the duty to be collected on imports from the Philippine Islands from 25 to 50 per cent of the Dingley rates. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. CARMACK. I sincerely hope so, too, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes have it.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PATTERSON. If it is not out of order to interrupt a roll call, I would like to have the Chair state precisely what the question is. I know that there is some misunderstanding.

Mr. LODGE. The question is whether the duty shall be 25 per cent of existing rates on sugar and tobacco or 50 per cent. To vote "yea" is to vote that it shall be 50 per cent.

Mr. FORAKER. A vote "yea" means that the amendment offered by the committee will be accepted.

Mr. LODGE. And makes the rate 50 per cent of the existing rate. The vote of the committee is "yea."

Mr. FORAKER. And a vote "nay" means 25 per cent.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. SIMON].

Mr. FOSTER of Washington (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN], and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. HANNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS], which I will transfer to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES], and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HEITFELD (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. MALLORY (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS]. We transfer our pairs to those two Senators, respectively, and I vote "nay."

Mr. MARTIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. NELSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS], and vote "nay."

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. QUARLES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I suggest to the Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO] that we make a transfer of our pairs, so that the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] will stand paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT], and we will vote.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. That is agreeable to me.

Mr. QUARLES. I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER]. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] that we transfer our pairs so that the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] will stand paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. That will permit of the Senator from Alabama and myself voting. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PETTUS. I vote "nay."

Mr. FOSTER of Louisiana (after having voted in the affirmative). I should like to inquire if the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. FOSTER of Louisiana. I withdraw my vote. I am paired with that Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I vote "yea."

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am paired with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS], who has been called from the city by a death in his family. That pair has been transferred to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], and I vote "nay."

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the negative). I will inquire whether the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. BACON. I had forgotten at the time that a special arrangement was made between him and myself this afternoon for a pair, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. CLARK]. I suggest, with the consent of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER], that my pair be transferred to the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], thus permitting both of us to vote.

Mr. PETTUS. I do not think the pair suggested by the Senator from Indiana is a fair transaction, both Senators voting on the same side.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I did not know that we were both voting on the same side. I understood that the Senator from Louisiana would vote upon the contrary side, of course. If I had not so understood, I certainly would not have suggested a transfer of our pairs.

Mr. BACON. I suggest to the Senator from Indiana that he can make that arrangement with myself, as I am voting on the opposite side from him.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I understood that the Senator from Louisiana would vote to the contrary of myself. I so stated to the Senator from Alabama. Is that correct?

Mr. FOSTER of Louisiana. I would vote "yea."

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then I suggest an arrangement with the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. I am paired for the evening with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I suggest a transfer of my pair to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], thus permitting us both to vote.

Mr. BACON. That is agreeable to me.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I vote "yea."

Mr. BACON. I will then permit my vote "nay" to stand.

Mr. PATTERSON. Is the vote of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] recorded?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. On the transfer of my pair to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] suggested that arrangement, which is, of course, agreeable to me. The Senator from Georgia votes on one side and I on the other.

Mr. QUAY (after having voted in the negative). I had forgotten when I voted upon this question that I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. I am not aware of his sentiments in relation to this bill, and I will therefore withdraw my vote, unless some Senator on the other side can inform me of his status as to this bill. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. PETTUS. I can state to the Senator from Pennsylvania that if my colleague [Mr. MORGAN] was present at this vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. QUAY. Then I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. FOSTER of Louisiana. I am informed that the junior Senator from North Dakota, if present, would vote "yea." I will therefore let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Aldrich,	Dietrich,	Hansbrough,	Platt, Conn.
Alger,	Dillingham,	Kean,	Spooner,
Bard,	Dryden,	Kittredge,	Teller,
Beveridge,	Fairbanks,	Lodge,	Warren,
Burnham,	Foster, La.	McEnery,	Wetmore.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON subsequently said: My colleague [Mr. CLAY], who is paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], has gone home ill.

Mr. LODGE subsequently said: I desire to say that I forgot very carelessly to make the statement that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] is my pair. He said to me before going that he agreed with me about this bill and authorized me to vote.

BARRACKS AND QUARTERS, PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Philippines:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In compliance with the provision of the act making appropriation for the support of the Army, approved June 30, 1902, I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of War showing expenditures made from the appropriation for "Barracks and quarters, Philippine Islands, 1903."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, March 3, 1903.

EDWARD L. BAILEY—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., March 3, 1903.

To the Senate:

I return herewith without approval Senate bill No. 1168, entitled "An act to authorize the appointment of Edward L. Bailey as captain of infantry, United States Army, and to place him on the retired list."

The beneficiary of this bill was undoubtedly a gallant officer in the volunteer forces during the civil war, and the sentiments of gratitude awakened by the consideration of his services as a volunteer officer have created a strong desire on my part to concur in the action of the Senate and the House expressed in the bill for his restoration to the Army.

An examination of Captain Bailey's military record while in the Regular Army, however, makes it plain that this natural desire can not be gratified by the officers who are charged with the administration of military justice consistently with their duty to enforce the law in such a way as to maintain discipline and a high standard of morals and honorable conduct among the officers of the Army.

While a volunteer officer Captain Bailey was twice tried by court-martial for disobedience of orders. Upon the first trial, in January, 1863, he was acquitted. Upon the second trial, in February, 1863, he was convicted and sentenced to forfeit two months' pay and emoluments and be reprimanded in General Orders.

On the 7th of March, 1867, he was appointed a second lieutenant of infantry, and he remained an officer of the Regular Army until the 15th of October, 1893. During that time he was five times tried by court-martial.

In September, 1871, he was tried and convicted of embezzlement and misappropriation of public moneys coming into his hands officially. The conviction was confirmed by the department commander who convened the court, but was disapproved by the President upon the ground that the money that was in his possession was lost by robbery, and his only wrongdoing was his failure to report the fact immediately.

In January, 1873, he was tried and convicted of neglect of duty in failing to attend at guard mounting when officer of the day, and at roll call on numerous occasions, not being prevented by sickness or other evident necessity, and was sentenced to be reprimanded.

In July, 1874, he was tried for neglect of duty, for conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman in borrowing money from enlisted men and failing to repay it, notwithstanding their repeated and persistent efforts to secure payment, and for purchasing supplies from various persons for the officers' mess, of which he was caterer, collecting the money from his fellow-officers to pay for the supplies, and appropriating the money to his own use, leaving the debts for the supplies unpaid; and he was sentenced to be dismissed the service. This sentence was approved by the department commander, but was mitigated by the President to suspension from rank and command for six months.

In April, 1890, he was tried for obtaining money on worthless checks drawn on banking firm with whom he had no credit, and acquitted. The department commander reviewing the action of the court disapproved the acquittal.

In September, 1893, he was tried and convicted of conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman in borrowing money from a fellow-officer and not repaying it, although repeatedly promising to do so; in entering a private house, in uniform, without permission, in the absence of the owner, beckoning to the owner's wife with his hand; refusing to leave the house when requested so to do by her; and in going to a public saloon in Boise City, Idaho, and chasing a prostitute about the saloon, and going to a corner of the saloon, holding a conversation with her while in uniform of a commissioned officer.

It appears that pending his trial upon these charges, he being under arrest, he was authorized by his commanding officer to visit Boise City for four hours, exclusive of meal time, beginning at 11.30 a. m., for the purpose of attending to personal business; that in disregard of his arrest he went to Boise City in the night of April 15-16, and there visited a saloon and drank with citizens at the bar between 11.30 p. m. and 1 a. m., and also visited a house of prostitution and behaved in a boisterous and disorderly manner in company with the same prostitute whom he was charged with chasing about the saloon, being at the time in the uniform of a commissioned officer.

Upon these acts additional charges were made of conduct to the prejudice of good order and military discipline and conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, and he was convicted upon these charges also. He was sentenced to be dismissed the service, and the sentence was approved and confirmed by the President.

The proceedings upon this last trial show that the sentence was not approved without a very careful review and examination both by General Schofield and by the President. Were I now empowered to review the proceedings again, I should be compelled to reach the same conclusion.

Captain Bailey has produced before the committees of the respective Houses a number of affidavits, some of which tend to impeach one of the principal witnesses for the prosecution, and in some of which other witnesses to some degree modify the testimony given by them ten years before. Giving full effect, however, to these ex parte affidavits, the conviction still remains sustained by the evidence.

It is plain that, when the President disapproved the conviction of embezzlement in 1871, when the conviction of the neglect of duty in 1873 was punished only by a reprimand, and when the conviction "unbecoming an officer and a gentleman," involving the misappropriation of public moneys in 1874, was followed by the President's mitigation of the sentence of dismissal to suspension for six months, the captain had the full benefit of his record as a volunteer officer in the civil war.

I do not think that further clemency can be extended on this ground consistently with the due administration of the law. I should not regard it as a proper exercise of the appointing power vested in me by the Constitution to appoint as an officer in the Army a man with the record of Captain Bailey, and with the sentence standing against him of dismissal from the Army, based upon sufficient grounds, after a fair trial, and after approval by my predecessor in the performance of his official duty.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WILLIAM H. H. BEADLE.

Mr. GAMBLE presented sundry papers in support of the bill (S. 7096) granting an increase of pension to William H. H. Beadle; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

SECOND HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

Mr. GAMBLE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 7229) to permit second homestead entries in certain cases, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15702) to amend an act entitled "An act temporarily to provide for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," approved March 8, 1902.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Philippines was to insert as section 2 the following:

SEC. 2. That for a period of five years the Government of the Philippine Islands are hereby authorized in their discretion to remit all duties upon material imported into the Philippine Islands for the construction or equipment of steam or electric railroads or street railways.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, the vote on the last amendment seems to me pretty sharply the contention which some of us raise in regard to this tariff legislation in the Philippines. So far as I am concerned, and those who think with me, it does not make any difference whether there is a duty of 1 per cent or a duty of 99 per cent. It is no difference at all if you can levy a duty. During this entire contention over these acquisitions we have been trying to get the dominant party to say what they will ultimately do with them.

If they are to belong to our country and if they are to be a part and parcel of our country, there should be no duties at all. They should be treated as other Territories. I myself, if they will say that the Philippines are to be treated the same as our other Territories, am willing to vote now for free trade for sugar and tobacco as well as free trade for other commodities. Therefore, so far as some of us are concerned, there is no difference in the schedule.

Now, some object that in the Cuban treaty and in this bill two items affecting our own country very greatly, sugar and tobacco, should be discriminated against. It was pointed out all through the tariff debate that you opened the 70,000,000 acres of public land in the Philippines to the exploitation of capitalists from the United States and invited them to go there under unusual advantages, giving them under the bill which has already passed the Congress the right to acquire tracts of 5,000 acres. Under that same bill it seemed to some of us, and does to me now, that the same corporations, through slight manipulations, could acquire not only 5,000 acres, but 100,000 acres or amounts much larger than that.

You now invite them to go to the Philippine Islands and to raise sugar and tobacco—sugar, chiefly, because I think I can safely say that the tobacco industry will not seriously interfere with us. Manila tobacco will not, in my judgment, seriously compete with our own tobacco. It will not stand the transportation; it is not nearly so good as our own, and can not very well, in my opinion, come into serious competition with our own tobacco industry.

But with sugar it is very different. From the testimony of all the men who appeared before the Committee on the Philippines, from the testimony which I have been able to gather from all sources, the Philippine Islands, so far as sugar raising is concerned, are the most productive of any islands, and have the most productive soil in the world.

Mr. FORAKER. I rise to inquire if all the committee amendments to this bill have been adopted?

Mr. LODGE. They have not been. The Senator from Idaho is addressing himself to one more.

Mr. FORAKER. Which is that?

Mr. DUBOIS. The last amendment.

Mr. FORAKER. I want to give notice, if it is in order, that I wish to move to amend the amendment which has just been adopted.

Mr. LODGE. That will be in order when the bill gets into the Senate.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. CARMACK. I have an amendment on the table.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that the committee amendments have not all been disposed of.

Mr. CARMACK. This is the last committee amendment not disposed of.

Mr. LODGE. There is one other formal amendment which we shall take up presently.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I do not object especially to the pending bill, but I object to the system which has brought the bill before the Senate at this time. I am greatly in hope that the party on the other side of the Chamber at some time will say to the Senate and the country what they intend ultimately shall be done with the Philippines.

You are inviting now by this legislation, you are inviting by all your dealings up to this time with the Philippines, a most serious competition between the laborers of our own country and the laborers of the Orient.

It has been demonstrated, so that no one controverts the proposition, that you can not cultivate the lands in the Philippine Islands with white labor; that you can not cultivate them with Filipino labor; and there is nothing left except Chinese or Japanese labor.

Those lands are very productive. You can raise three or four times as much sugar on one acre of land there as you can raise in this country; you can raise more sugar on the lands in the Philippines than can be raised in Hawaii. In Hawaii they raise on one of the great plantations as much as 10 tons of sugar to the acre.

The average production of sugar per acre in Louisiana is from 1 to 1½ tons per acre, or from 2,000 to 3,000 pounds. Texas is slightly under Louisiana. The average in Porto Rico, which is another tropical country, is about 4½ tons an acre, or about three times that of Louisiana.

The average production in Cuba is about 4 tons per acre, and the average production in Hawaii is about 4 tons per acre, running as high as 11 tons per acre on one large plantation. In the Philippine Islands, from all the testimony which can be gathered, their production would be even larger than that in Hawaii.

The Senator from Massachusetts in charge of this bill says that no sugar comes here from the Philippine Islands. That may be so at the present time, because that country is in a state of war or insurrection; but I will just read a short table on that subject.

In 1861 there were 59,000 tons exported; in 1871, 97,000 tons. I am reading in round numbers. In 1881 there were exported 135,000 tons; in 1893, 292,000 tons; and in 1897 the exportation dropped off to 105,000 tons. But all of their methods of production are primitive. With the same means which are employed in Hawaii they could produce enough sugar in the Philippine Islands to supply the markets of the world.

My contention is simply this—I want to raise it again—that every effort you protectionists are making is against an industry which ought to appeal to the heart of every protectionist in the United States.

We can raise west of the Missouri River by irrigation on those plains enough beet sugar to supply the world; yet you are putting our country in competition with these tropical countries. There is not a bill which you have brought here which does not strike at the beet-sugar industry. I am not talking about trusts. I am talking about the men who can raise beet sugar on our plains.

Why not adopt the policy now, as well as at any other time, which was outlined by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. DIETRICH] in a very able speech delivered here not long ago, which I fear has not received enough attention from this Senate? I confess that I myself read it only by accident.

It was published on the front page of the RECORD one morning, and the Senator being a colleague of mine on the Philippines Committee, I glanced over the speech and became very much interested in it.

He advanced the proper solution for this question—that is, to put a tax on coffee and on products raised in tropical countries which are indigenous to the soil of the Philippine Islands—encourage those people there to raise things which naturally belong there, and protect them in doing so, but do not invite the capitalists from this country to go to the Philippine Islands and take up 70,000,000 acres of land and on them raise sugar to compete with us.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] said to me not long ago that he had given up all hope of cane sugar; that it was doomed; that it could not stand the competition. It is not so with beet sugar. We can raise enough of beet sugar in our Western country to supply the world if you extend to us the proper protection which belongs to us as a tenet of your party principles.

I know that this is more or less irrelevant to this bill; but at the same time I object to the reduction of the Dingley rates of duty on sugar; and I say here in my place if you will announce your policy to treat the Philippine Islands as a part of this country I will vote for free sugar, and I can do that on principle; but if you are going to call them a dependency, then protect us of the West against them. You ought to do it; it belongs of right to us to ask that you do it, and not single out these two items in your Cuban reciprocity bill and in this bill—tobacco and sugar—as objects of attack.

I voted very cheerfully in committee to give these people $3,000,000, and there is not a colleague of mine on this side of the Chamber who will not vote to give them $10,000,000 if they are in distress, but do not invite competition here with the labor there.

I say—and it will not be controverted of anyone—that the Filipinos will not perform this labor, and white men can not do it. Do not invite labor there of the cheap kind, Chinese or Japanese, and put it in competition with our labor in raising beet sugar in the West or cane sugar in the South. It is not fair; it is not in consonance with the principles of the Republican party, and there is no exigency in the distress of the Philippine Islands to induce you to do it.

I am talking to-night, not because I desire to do so, not because

I desire to delay the passage of this bill, but because I want to call attention again to the injustice that you are doing.

Leave the rates as they are. The Filipinos are not going to get very much advantage by this slight reduction; but if you again invite capitalists to go there from this country to buy this land and cultivate sugar plantations with the labor which they must have, you are not going to get them out.

It has been said to me—not by the chairman of the committee—that an amendment would be accepted limiting the life of this bill, should it become a law, to three or four years. That will not do. Whenever the capitalists go to the Philippines to cultivate the sugar lands there their demands can be properly lodged against us that, as we have invited them to go there, they are entitled to our protection in the future.

I am not talking to Senators as an advocate especially of the Western industry, but I say now, after the experiment has been well made, that in my deliberate judgment, if you will give us fair protection, a fair chance, we can raise enough sugar in the United States between the Missouri River and the Pacific Ocean to supply our own wants at any rate, and possibly supply some of the other countries, and you ought not to put us in competition on all sides with tropical countries in the raising of sugar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, at this late hour of the night of the last day of the session I would not undertake to occupy the time of Senators again if such profound ignorance of the beet-sugar industry had not been developed in the course of the debates; and I do not think it fair to the Senate or to the country that a measure of this importance should be passed upon in ignorance of what the danger is.

Believing, Mr. President, that there should be at least a fair knowledge of what is contemplated and what will probably result, I will undertake with some detail and perhaps in a somewhat uninteresting way to throw light upon the subject.

THE SOURCE OF INFORMATION.

I want to say to the Senate that information relating to this question has been so completely compiled and so ably presented by another Senator that I will not depend upon my own labors, but will adopt the results of his.

If the Senate had listened with any degree of attention to the very able exposition of the question by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. MCENERY], so that Senators would have the benefit of the information he so clearly imparted, it is barely possible that I might be content to allow a vote to come at this time.

RELY UPON MR. DIETRICH'S LABOR.

The facts and arguments upon which I will chiefly rely have been compiled by one of the ablest Senators upon this floor, though one of the most modest, and certainly the quietest, member of the body. The effort calls my attention to the fact that the man who says the least very often does the ablest work; that the man who occupies the least time upon the floor does the greatest amount of work in the seclusion of his chamber; and I bear testimony to the great industry, skill, and patience that what is denominated a speech by the Hon. CHARLES H. DIETRICH, of Nebraska, develops.

If I had an assurance, Mr. President, that those who favored this measure would have twenty-four hours to read the document to which I refer and could then return to the Senate to vote upon this bill, I would not say a word, because I am convinced that the facts and reasoning of the Senator from Nebraska are so conclusive that they would carry with them every Senator except those who are under too many obligations to the head of the sugar trust, or to those who are creating syndicates and corporations to grab the lands of the Philippine Islands to turn them into tobacco fields and sugar plantations. But I am quite convinced that the disinterested Senator, the wise Senator, the honest Senator, after reading the document prepared by the Senator from Nebraska, would come back and cast his vote against this measure.

MR. DIETRICH'S PLAN.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] merely suggested the main proposition that the Senator from Nebraska so ably expounds in the document to which I refer, namely, that instead of legislating for the encouragement of sugar in the Philippine Islands, they should be led to produce the crops that are not raised in this country and that are indigenous to the Philippine Islands, and which, if industriously cultivated, would make the islands independently rich, and at the same time permit those engaged in agricultural pursuits in this country to get all the benefits that our own soil, our climate, and our growing population might naturally secure for them.

Let me give you some of the articles that are quite indigenous to the Philippine Islands and that can not be cultivated in the United States: Coffee, india rubber and gutta-percha, Manila hemp, sisal grass and other fibers, copra and cocoanuts, copal, other gums, cabinet wood unmanufactured, shells, cacao or cocoa, indigo.

Of these articles the United States imported for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901–2, $144,873,556 worth. Of the same articles the total exports from the Philippines to the United States in 1901 amounted to but $17,548,447. The total exports from the Philippines to all countries of the same products amounted to $23,069,195.

What is the proposition of the Senator from Nebraska? It is to enact a law taking these articles from the free list and imposing a reasonably heavy import duty upon every one of them, and at the same time admit so much of them as is grown in the Philippines free. That means that, in a very few years, as will be readily understood when the capacity of the islands for their production is considered, instead of this country paying out $145,000,000 annually to foreign countries for them, this country will pay to the Philippines the $145,000,000. Instead of sending this vast sum to the agriculturalists of foreign lands it will be sent to the Philippine Islands, and in encouraging the production of those items and not unduly encouraging the production of sugar and tobacco, which comes in conflict with like products of the United States, our home industry would not be seriously interfered with, while the prosperity of the Philippine Islands would be assured.

It does seem to me, Mr. President, that this is a proposition well worthy the consideration of the Senate. Especially is it worthy the consideration of those Senators who claim to be the champions of American industry and seek the confidence and support of the American people, claiming that they are the elect of the country for that particular purpose.

AMOUNTS INVESTED IN AMERICAN SUGAR.

In connection with this suggestion, I desire to call the attention of the friends of this measure to the immense sums invested by American sugar producers of the United States in everything that is necessary for the production of sugar, and to show to them that they are inaugurating a policy which must inevitably within a very short time destroy those vast investments and transform the sugar lands into a waste unless they are utilized for other crops.

In the cane-sugar industry of Louisiana, Texas, and other Southern States	$100,000,000
In 52 beet-sugar factories, located in eleven States from New York to California	50,000,000
In cane and beet sugar farming implements and machinery (United States census) on 40,000 farms	33,651,170
In 24,567 cigar and cigarette factories located in 52 States and Territories (United States census)	67,706,493
In tobacco-farming implements and machinery on 106,272 farms (United States census)	8,150,980

Thus, as shown by the figures of the census, there is in the neighborhood of $260,000,000 invested in the sugar industry of the United States. These are the investments you are assailing. This is the property the destruction of which this measure initiates. This vast amount of money invested in the sugar industry is to go for nothing in order to relieve the present miserable condition of the Filipino—relief, as was demonstrated by the few, clear-cut sentences of the senior Senator from Massachusetts, that it will never convey.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. DIETRICH] makes this statement:

> The American sugar cane and sugar beet growers and the American manufacturers of sugar have grave cause for apprehension if the tariff on Philippine sugar is further reduced.

In 1901 American farmers raised 1,685,688 tons of beets.

I wonder if the junior Senator from Massachusetts is aware of the enormous proportions of the sugar-beet industry. Let me give the figures again: In 1901 American farmers raised 1,685,688 tons of beets, for which they received from the sugar manufacturers an average of $4.50 per ton. From these beets the factories extracted an average of 219 pounds of sugar per ton. For the truth of that fact I refer the Senator to Senate Document No. 316, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, page 36.

The American sugar-beet farmers received $2.05 for each hundred pounds of sugar that the factories extracted from their beets. I trust the Senators will bear in mind these last figures. The farmers receive $2.05 for each 100 pounds of sugar which the factories extracted from their beets. To this must of course be added the expense of putting the beets through the factory, expense of management, insurance, interest, packages, freight, etc., to arrive at the present cost of producing the sugar.

COST OF PRODUCING AMERICAN AND PHILIPPINE SUGAR.

While the figures are not given, it is known that the present cost of producing beet sugar in the United States averages from 3 to 4 cents per pound.

Mr. ALDRICH. What is that?

Mr. PATTERSON. The cost of producing beet sugar in the United States averages from 3 to 4 cents per pound. I trust that the smile on the Senator's face is not a smile of incredulity, but, in any event, I am glad——

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator is not stating it on his own knowledge.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes; that is a statement on my own knowledge. I am glad to see the sunshine return to his genial countenance——

Mr. ALDRICH. It never departed.

Mr. PATTERSON. It was absent from it last night.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no; the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. PATTERSON. And was again under a cloud this morning.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not know what are the plans of the leaders here, and I do not know that the Senator from Colorado cares especially about an audience. He has objected to some of those who were discourteous enough to interrupt him in his remarks.

I have done a little of it, though in a very low tone, and I beg pardon for any disturbance which I may have caused. But if we are going to do business, I think his interesting speech should be listened to, and if the Senator from Colorado does not object, I should like to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. PATTERSON. I should be very glad indeed if I had a larger audience.

Mr. TILLMAN. I suggest that there is no quorum in the Senate, Mr. President.

Mr. SPOONER. What effect will that have upon the audience?

Mr. PATTERSON. It is quite immaterial as to the audience. It is simply what I like.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll; and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Carmack,	Hale,	Patterson,
Alger,	Clark, Wyo.	Hanna,	Penrose,
Allee,	Cockrell,	Hansbrough,	Perkins,
Allison,	Deboe,	Heitfeld,	Pettus,
Bacon,	Depew,	Kean,	Platt, Conn.
Ball,	Dietrich,	Kittredge,	Quarles,
Bard,	Dolliver,	Lodge,	Spooner,
Bate,	Dryden,	McEnery,	Stewart,
Beveridge,	Fairbanks,	Mallory,	Teller,
Blackburn,	Foraker,	Martin,	Tillman,
Burnham,	Foster, Wash.	Mason,	Warren,
Burton,	Gallinger,	Nelson,	Wetmore.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

PREVENTION OF COUNTERFEITING.

Mr. SPOONER. I withdraw the motion which I entered earlier in the day to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (H. R. 13075) to amend section 3 of the act further to prevent counterfeiting or manufacturing of dies, tools, or other implements used in manufacturing, etc., approved February 10, 1892.

REFUND OF IMPORT DUTIES.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator who has the floor yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes; always with pleasure; with more pleasure than the Senator yields to me.

Mr. FORAKER. Oh, the Senator from Colorado is mistaken. I hope to be able to assure the Senator of that fact. I ask unanimous consent that the business under consideration may be temporarily laid aside, and that Calendar No. 3177 may be considered. It is a House bill, which has been favorably reported without amendment, and if favorably acted upon will become a law. I think it ought to do so. It will take only a moment to read it, and it will not interfere——

Mr. SPOONER. What is the bill?

Mr. FORAKER. To refund the amounts paid as duties on merchandise from Porto Rico during the time between the ratification of the treaty of peace and the passage by Congress of the civil government act.

Mr. SPOONER. Paid under protest?

Mr. FORAKER. Paid without protest. It applies both to Porto Rico and to the Philippines. The total amount is about $45,000. It is equitable and just, and has been unanimously reported by the committee.

Mr. KEAN. I hope the bill will pass.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that a certain bill may be considered.

Mr. ALDRICH. From what committee does the bill come?

Mr. PATTERSON. If that motion is sustained, will it permanently supersede this bill?

Mr. FORAKER. Not at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Temporarily only.

Mr. LODGE. The request was that the pending business be temporarily laid aside; and I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent was asked for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. LODGE. If a motion is made, of course I shall resist it.

Mr. FORAKER. No; I do not make a motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. ALDRICH. What is the bill?

Mr. PATTERSON. What is the bill?

Mr. LODGE. Let the title be stated.

Mr. PATTERSON. I think I will object.

Mr. KEAN. I trust the Senator from Colorado will withdraw his objection.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator will not object. It will take but a moment.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I must object.

Mr. FORAKER. Why should the Senator object?

Mr. PATTERSON. Simply because it is difficult to resume the thread of one's argument.

Mr. FORAKER. I notice the Senator yielded with alacrity to the Senator from South Carolina to suggest the absence of a quorum. But, of course, he had to.

Mr. PATTERSON. There is a vast amount of difference——

Mr. FORAKER. I thought the Senator had reached a point where he could suffer a little interruption.

Mr. PATTERSON. I was talking to empty benches, and it was commiseration on the part of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. FORAKER. I think if you will let the Senate consider this bill I may be able to get a full Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that it is cruel, after I got the Senator from Colorado an audience, to take it away from him.

Mr. FORAKER. It will take only a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. FORAKER. I hope there will not be any objection.

Mr. PATTERSON. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is impossible to tell what the bill is.

Mr. FORAKER. I will tell the Senator what the bill is if he will allow me.

Mr. LODGE. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The title of the bill will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 15155) to refund the amount of duties paid on merchandise brought into the United States from Porto Rico between April 11, 1899, and May 1, 1900, and also on merchandise brought into the United States from the Philippine Islands between April 11, 1899, and March 8, 1902, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. From what committee does the bill come?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. From the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator wants further information, I can say to him that the total amount of the duties paid on importations from Porto Rico during that period was about $10,000, and the total amount paid in the way of duties on importations from the Philippines during that period was about $35,000.

This authorizes a refund of such duties as were not paid under protest, and puts the duties which were not paid under protest upon the same plane as those that were paid under protest. The law already authorizes the refunding of duties paid under protest.

Mr. MASON. It is following the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; it is strictly in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

M'CLURE & WILLBANKS.

Mr. BACON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a small bill of half a dozen lines.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. PATTERSON. I do.

Mr. BACON. I ask the Senate to consider the bill (H. R. 11340) for the relief of McClure and Willbanks.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to McClure & Willbanks, livery-stable keepers at Toccoa, Ga., $100, the value of a horse hired to internal-revenue officers and killed by illicit distillers in August, 1900.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Is there a report, Mr. President?

Mr. BACON. There is a House report in detail giving all the evidence.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. REID, from the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives, May 20, 1902:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11340) for the relief of McClure & Willbanks, beg leave to submit the following report and recommend that said bill do pass:

This claim is recommended by the Treasury Department. The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury and the communication of the Commissioner of Internal-Revenue recommending the payment of this claim is hereto attached as a part of this report.

[House Document No. 237, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, January 10, 1902.

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith, for the consideration of Congress, copy of a communication from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, of the 6th instant, and copies of accompanying papers, submitting the claim of McClure & Willbanks, livery-stable keepers at Toccoa, Ga., for the value of a horse hired to internal-revenue officers and killed by illicit distillers in August, 1900.

Respectfully,

L. J. GAGE,
Secretary.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, January 6, 1902.

SIR: I inclose herewith a letter from McClure & Willbanks, livery-stable keepers at Toccoa, Ga., referred to this office by Hon. F. C. Tate, M. C., making claim for the value of a horse hired to the internal-revenue officers and killed by illicit distillers in August, 1900.

I also inclose an affidavit of Deputy Collector R. S. Henderson covering the facts of the case.

The claim appears to be a just one, and I have the honor to suggest that, if you approve, it be forwarded to the Committee on Claims, House of Representatives, with a recommendation for an appropriation in favor of the claimants.

J. W. YERKES, Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

TOCCOA, GA., February 27, 1901.

DEAR SIR: From our letter head you will see that we are in the livery business, and as such hired to Captain Henderson, deputy collector of internal revenue United States, a two-horse buggy to make a trip into South Carolina, in Oconee County, to capture "moonshiners" and violators of the internal-revenue laws, and while on that trip, in July, 1900, the "moonshiners" attacked him while in the buggy and killed one of the horses dead and shot a hole through the other horse's ear and tried to get the captain, but failed. The horse was worth about $100, as it was a good season for our business.

We have been informed by the revenue officers on that side of the river that they have forwarded a claim for our loss to the Government; but as we have been so far unable to learn anything of the claim or its whereabouts, and believing the same has been forwarded through the regular channel to the Court of Claims, would kindly ask you to inquire at that office if such claim has been received.

The claim was said to be forwarded from the State of South Carolina. I hope you will not think us presumptious in writing to you about this claim, but have been advised that if we have a friend in Washington, to lay the matter before him, and have therefore called on you.

Yours, very truly,

McCLURE & WILLBANKS,

Hon. F. C. TATE, M. C.,
Ninth Congressional District, Georgia.

I ask that this claim be paid.

F. C. TATE,
Member of Congress, Georgia.

STATE OF GEORGIA, County of Fulton:

R. S. Henderson, of Jasper, Pickens County, Ga., states on oath that during the month of August, 1900, he was a deputy collector of internal revenue in the district of Georgia; that he was at that time assigned to duty as a raiding deputy, with headquarters at Toccoa, Ga.; that he made a raid for illicit distillers in Rabun County, Ga., and Oconee County, S. C.; that he was accompanied by Revenue Agent C. B. White and Deputy United States Marshal McKinney and Posseman John Chapman, all of South Carolina; that he was also accompanied on the raid by Deputy United States Marshal T. R. Glenn, of Georgia, but Mr. Glenn was not with him at the time of the shooting hereinafter referred to; that on the 7th of August (1900) the raiding party destroyed two illicit distilleries in Oconee County, S. C.; that these distilleries were not more than three-quarters of a mile apart; that one of these illicit distilleries was supposed to be the property of W. W. Wooten and the other was supposed to be the property of one Compton; that at Compton's distillery (the last destroyed) the raiding party found two packages containing approximately 30 gallons of whisky; that this whisky was loaded into the hack and the raiding party started out with it, it being the intention to take the whisky to the railroad; that between a quarter and a half mile from the distillery, and while the party was going into the public road, they were fired on from ambush; that the first volley killed the "off" horse hitched to the buggy which affiant was driving; that affiant and his party, after the ambushing party was repulsed, resumed their journey, leaving the dead horse in the road; that about half a mile farther on they were fired on from ambush the second time, but no damage was done. Affiant states that the first shooting was done within 200 yards of Wooten's house, which was located near Battle Creek, Oconee County, S. C.

Affiant states further that he hired the team he was driving at the time he was fired on from McClure & Willbanks, Toccoa, Ga.; that the horse killed was one of the horses of said team, and was the property of McClure & Willbanks; that he was paying $2.50 per day for the team, the same being the usual charge for double teams in that section; that he verily believes that the party that fired on him were illicit distillers, and that he was fired on because he was discharging his duty as an officer of the internal-revenue department.

Affiant states that the horse was about 14½ hands tall, was 6 years old, and was worth $75 in cash at the time he was killed.

R. S. HENDERSON.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 16th day of December, 1901.

[SEAL.]

O. C. FULLER,
Clerk United States Circuit Court.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Would the Senator from Georgia be willing to make an amendment putting in at the sworn value of the horse $75?

Mr. BACON. The owner of the horse, who is presumed to know most about it, says that he was worth $100.

Mr. ALDRICH. About $100.

Mr. BACON. The Senator recognizes the fact that to amend the bill is to kill it. Of course, if he takes this method of doing it I have no redress.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The bill has one merit, and only one—that it is only for $100.

Mr. BACON. I think that is a very great one.

Mr. SPOONER. The amount of the claim is not what troubles me about it. I am willing that the Senate should adopt the value by the owner of the horse that was killed dead [laughter], but if it were not for the fact that an amendment would kill the bill, I think it ought to be amended so as to require the owner in consideration of this $100 to release any claim for damages to the ear of the other horse—the nigh horse. [Laughter.]

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COAL LANDS IN ALASKA.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask the Senator from Colorado to yield to me for the consideration of a short House bill.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will yield if there are no four-page reports to be read.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. There will be no report to be read. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16946) to amend an act entitled "An act to extend the coal-land laws of the District of Alaska," approved June 6, 1900.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. HEITFELD. I have received several protests against the passage of the bill, and I feel constrained to object to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

WILLIAM LEECH.

Mr. MASON. I ask unanimous consent, if the Senator from Colorado will yield, for the consideration of a small bill and a very meritorious one with which nearly every member of the Senate is familiar. It is the bill (H. R. 3357) for the relief of William Leech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. PATTERSON. I yield for the consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay William Leech $2,500 as full compensation for permanent injuries received in falling in the elevator shaft of the Treasury building, without any contributary negligence and while in discharge of his official duties, on the 29th day of March, 1893.

Mr. KEAN. Let us have the report read in that case.

Mr. MASON. The bill is from the Committee on Claims. The Senator is familiar with it. It is a House bill. I hope the Senator will not object.

Mr. KEAN. I did not object. I asked for the reading of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No report has been filed with this bill.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I have just entered the Chamber after an absence of an hour or two and I desire to ascertain the exact parliamentary status of business. What is before the Senate now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is known as the Philippine tariff bill was temporarily laid aside, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] having the floor, and unanimous consent has been given for the present consideration of the bill which has been read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. QUAY. What is the bill?

Mr. MASON. I will explain it.

Mr. PATTERSON. I hope the Senator from Illinois will not take up too much of my time.

Mr. MASON. I shall endeavor not to do so. It is a bill for the relief of William Leech.

Mr. QUAY. All right.

Mr. MASON. All right. The Senator understands it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHOCTAWHATCHEE RIVER BRIDGE, ALABAMA.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16881) to authorize the court of county commissioners of Geneva County, Ala., to construct a bridge across the Choctawhatchee River, in Geneva County, Ala.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. PATTERSON. With pleasure.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to insert, as section 2, the following:

SEC. 2. That said bridge shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post route, and shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post roads in the United States; and no charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, troops, and munitions of war of the United States. Equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph and telephone companies, and the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge and its approaches for postal-telegraph purposes.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not adopt the amendment. This is a dirt road in a piny woods county. It is an iron bridge, but it is not for anything else but county purposes. The United States has a right to use any of those roads.

The telegraph line would not give 6¼ cents for the privilege of hitching their wires to it, because they could tie to any tree on one side and a hundred feet over the other to the next. It is a small stream, really not navigable but declared so by law, and therefore this permission has to be obtained.

I know that such amendments are generally put on railroad-bridge bills and structures of that kind, but here the Secretary of War has the right to prescribe all the rules and regulations for it. It is a neighborhood country road, with a bridge across a large creek that is declared navigable by law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SEWARD SQUARE, WASHINGTON CITY.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PATTERSON. I desire to make a suggestion. I will yield to the Senator from New Hampshire, and then resume the thread of my remarks for about five minutes, that the understanding between myself and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] may be carried out.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15799) to confirm the name of Seward square for the space formed by the intersection of C street south and Pennsylvania and North Carolina avenues, District of Columbia.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered o a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15702) to amend an act entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," approved March 8, 1902.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, when my remarks were interrupted with the request for the passage of bills by unanimous consent I had shown that it costs in the United States between 3 and 4 cents a pound for the production and placing upon the market of Amercan beet sugar. The Government reports show that the cost of producing sugar in the Philippines, including interest on the investment and other charges, was but 95 cents per 100 pounds.

Contrast those figures for a moment—official figures. Between 3 and 4 cents to produce the American beet sugar and to produce the Filipino cane sugar less than 1 cent per pound. When you add the 15 cents per hundredweight to transport the Philippine sugar to the United States it will cost, including duties, even though the duties had not been reduced at all, less than $2 per 100 pounds laid down in the United States.

FILIPINOS OPPOSED TO FREE TRADE.

I will now pass to a matter that I wish to call to the attention of the chairman of the Committee on the Philippines and of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], if he is here. It is that the Filipinos themselves do not want this measure. I demonstrate that from the sworn testimony of one of the great lights of the Filipino people. He was glorified by the Republican party and the Philippine Commission.

I refer to Buencamino, sent here by the Philippine Commission. He was brought to this country last summer as a living illustration of the ability of the Philippine Commission to civilize the Filipino people under the American policy. He was traveled from city to city. He had been brought into complete complacency with the Philippine policy of the Administration, and was brought before the proper committee of the House of Representatives to give testimony. There happened to be a namesake of mine on the House committee, and it was he who propounded the following questions to Buencamino:

Mr. PATTERSON. Do the Filipinos desire free trade with this country?
Mr. BUENCAMINO. The sugar and tobacco producers desire free trade.
Mr. PATTERSON. Does the great mass of the people desire it?
Mr. BUENCAMINO. No; because the mass of the people has seen that the Government gives the money to the Filipino, and the money is necessary there because there are many ruins to repair.

What he meant was this: The duties paid upon Filipino imports into this country, 75 per cent of the Dingley rates, are returned to the Philippine Islands as a gift to the Philippine government. Buencamino said that the mass of the Philippine people did not want free trade; that they preferred the present relations and the present conditions under which we collect 75 per cent of the Dingley tariff rates and returned it to the Philippine Commission, to be spent on internal improvements, giving it back to the Filipino people.

Therefore the leading spirit of the Filipino people, the one selected by the Administration and brought over to this country to show how completely the Filipino had been brought into perfect harmony with the Administration, testified that the Filipino people did not want free trade, nor did they want any meddling with the tariff upon sugar and tobacco, because the more you lessen the duties upon them the closer you approach to free trade, and the more you deduct from the fund that is returned by the United States to the treasury of the Philippine Islands.

Now, Mr. President, I yield for the present to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, the debate upon the pending Philippine tariff bill is to me somewhat amusing. I remember very distinctly that when the Philippine bill was being considered last winter it became my duty, as I thought, to make a motion to reduce the tariff 25 per cent. On that motion I received a miserable vote of 7 against the entire majority otherwise of the Senate.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] voted with me, I think; the entire Democratic side of the Senate voted against me, and there were two or three others, I think, who supported the motion. I am very glad that the other House of Congress and this Senate, since that day, has come under some sort of religious conviction upon this question, and I hope sincerely that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] may be able to pass his bill.

But it was not upon that point that I desired to address myself to the Senate. During the last few months the bill known as the omnibus statehood bill has been under consideration in the Senate. I have heard it said within the last few days that that bill was dead, that the cerements of the grave have been wrapped around it, that it has been carried into the gloomy cavern of death, and laid away there for resurrection.

Three States have been, Mr. President, knocking at the doors of this American Union, and when this Congress met they were as fully equipped as any Territories that were ever admitted as States of the Union, but they have been denied admission; the doors have been barred against them. In the next Congress four States will knock for admission and the doors then will be opened and they will be admitted. This is my declaration here to-night.

As to the proposition of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON], the agreement between him and me was simply that he permit his remarks to be suspended while I offered an amendment to the pending bill, which I now send to the Secretary's desk and ask to have read. I will say to the clerks at the desk that the amendment is embraced in 46 pages in italics.

Mr. NELSON. I raise the point of order on the amendment, that it is not germane to this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has not heard it yet.

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator have the kindness to await the reading of the amendment for the information of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania sends to the desk a proposed amendment, and asks that it be read.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to say, in explanation of this amendment, that I desire once for all to get the sense of the Senate on the statehood bill. That is all there is in this proposition.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, does the Senator from Pennsylvania think if this amendment is attached to the Philippine bill we can have a vote on the Philippine tariff bill? Can he assure us of that?

Mr. QUAY. That is a question for the Senator from New Jersey and his colleagues. If they desire to talk to death the Philippine tariff bill because the statehood bill is on it, that is their privilege.

Mr. KEAN. I only want to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether he can assure the Senate that there will be a vote taken on the Philippine tariff bill in the event of the adoption of his amendment?

Mr. QUAY. I have nothing to say, Mr. President, on the Philippine tariff bill. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is in charge of that bill.

Mr. KEAN. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania has a great deal to do with it.

Mr. PATTERSON. Let me suggest, in response to the question of the Senator from New Jersey, that if this amendment shall be adopted the Philippine tariff bill will be so vastly improved that it will offer a very strong inducement to those who are now opposed to the tariff bill to suspend their opposition; but whether it will suspend it or not, of course I would not want to say at this time. I should have to indulge in a little reflection.

Mr. QUAY. I am not prepared to assure the Senator from New Jersey of the result which would follow the adoption of this amendment on the tariff bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the reading of the amendment be proceeded with, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be read.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to say for the information of the clerks that the amendment I have sent is the part in italics in the bill, which runs from page 1 to page 46.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Has the Senator any objection to the part in plain type being read as well as that in italics?

Mr. QUAY. Well, I think that would be dilatory. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It might be of benefit for purposes of comparison.

The Secretary proceeded to read the amendment submitted by Mr. QUAY.

Mr. QUAY. If the Secretary will desist from reading for a moment, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the fact that the Indian Territory is cut out of the amendment as it is now offered.

Mr. TILLMAN. You have cut out that clause dividing the Indian Territory, to be added to Oklahoma piecemeal?

Mr. QUAY. That is cut out.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I will vote for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. QUAY. Then you are no longer bunkoed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator from Pennsylvania has cut out the Indian Territory, and if his amendment should be attached to the Philippine tariff bill, and the bill as thus amended should pass, that would not be the bill that passed the House of Representatives.

Mr. QUAY. No.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then it would be necessary for it to go back to the House of Representatives to be passed upon?

Mr. QUAY. It would then be an amendment to the Philippine bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I know; but the Senator said to the Senator from South Carolina that the portion in relation to Indian Territory had been cut out.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina said he would not vote for this bill unless the Indian Territory was cut out of it, and I have said to the Senator from South Carolina that the Indian Territory is cut out of it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I want to point out to the Senator from Pennsylvania——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PATTERSON. I yielded only to the Senator from Pennsylvania. If he yields to others I shall be compelled to resume the thread of my remarks.

Mr. QUAY. Then I will yield to no one.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I would not interrupt the thread of the remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will resume the reading of the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

ANNA O. BRUSH.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there is just one remaining pension bill on the Calendar, which ought to be passed so as to go to the other House. I ask unanimous consent that the pending business may be informally laid aside in order that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3420) granting a pension to Anna O. Brush.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the pending business may be informally laid aside in order that the consideration of the bill named by him may be proceeded with. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Anna O. Brush, widow of Alfred I. Brush, late of Company B, Twelfth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15702) to amend an act entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," approved March 8, 1902.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be continued.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the amendment down to the end of line 12 on page 10.

Mr. DEPEW. The parent of the proposition is here, and I should like to ask why the penitentiary and the public schools have the same amount of public land?

Mr. FORAKER. What is the inquiry of the Senator from New York?

Mr. DEPEW. Why it is that the penitentiary and the public schools have each a hundred thousand acres of land—the same amount?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not think that is the provision. I should like to have it read again.

Mr. DEPEW. I wish the Secretary would go back and read it. It seems to me we have passed a bill that the President of the United States was compelled to veto, which illustrates the carelessness with which the two Houses of Congress—you can not allude to one, but you may to both—legislate.

It passed unanimously in both Houses and passed unanimously the committees of both Houses. Now, having had that example before us to-night, when I find, if I heard read aright——

Mr. QUAY. I have just entered the Chamber. If the Senator from New York will pause a moment, I should like to ask what is the parliamentary situation of my amendment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is being read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is being read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. DEPEW. The Senator from New York——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please come to order.

Mr. HALE. I rise to present a privileged report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17288) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 23, 24, 31, 33, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 42, 44, 45, 47, 54, 55, and 79.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 6, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, 20, 21, 25, 27, 28, 30, 32, 34, 43, 49, 51, 53, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 71, 72, 75, 76, 77, and 78.

And agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following: "and also naval constructors and assistant naval constructors;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$4,336,940;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following: "and no part of the same shall hereafter be used for the purchase of lands;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of said amendment, after the word "and," strike out the words "William L. Marcy" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the mayor;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of said amendment, after the words "sum of," strike out the word "five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "one;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 29, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$82,800;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$17,900;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 46, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$77,442.52;" and on page 63 of the bill, line 22, after the word "Academy," strike out the words "two hundred and sixty-nine thousand three hundred and ninety-seven dollars and thirty-four cents," and insert in lieu thereof the words "two hundred and seventy thousand three hundred and ninety-seven dollars and thirty-four cents;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 48, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter struck out by said amendment insert the following: "Provided further, That members of the Fifty-seventh Congress who will not be members of the Fifty-eighth Congress, and in whose districts or States appointments have not been made or vacancies filled in the Fifty-seventh Congress, may immediately upon the passage of this act make the additional appointments herein provided for;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 4 of said amendment strike out the word "nine" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirteen;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 52, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following: "That after January 1, 1904, all candidates for admission to the Naval Academy at the time of their examination must be between the ages of 16 and 20 years;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 70, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That for the purpose of further increasing the naval establishment of the United States the President is hereby authorized to have constructed by contract or in navy-yards as hereinafter provided three first-class battle ships carrying the heaviest armor and most powerful ordnance for vessels of their class upon a trial displacement of not more than 16,000 tons, and to have the highest practicable speed and great radius of action, and to cost, exclutve of armor and armament, not exceeding $4,212,000 each; two first-class battle ships, carrying the heaviest armor and most powerful ordnance for vessels of their class, upon a trial displacement of not more than 13,000 tons, and to have the highest practicable speed and great radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $3,500,000 each; two steel ships, to be used in training landsmen and apprentices, to be propelled by sail, and to cost, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $370,000 each; one wooden brig, to be used for training landsmen and apprentices at stations, to be propelled by sails, and to cost, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $50,000; and the contract for the construction of each of said vessels shall be awarded, by the Secretary of the Navy, to the lowest best responsible bidder, having in view the best results and the most expeditious delivery; and in the construction of all of said vessels the provisions of the act of August 3 ,1886, entitled "An act to increase the naval establishment," as to materials for said vessels, their engines, boilers, and machinery, the contracts under which they are built, the notice of any proposals for the same, the plans, drawings, specifications therefor, and the method of executing said contracts shall be observed and followed, and subject to the provisions of this act, all said vessels shall be built in compliance with the terms of said act, and in all their parts shall be of domestic machinery; and the steel material shall be of domestic manufacture, and of the quality and characteristics best adapted to the various purposes for which it may be used, in accordance with specifications approved by the Secretary of the Navy; and not more than two of the five battle ships provided for in this act shall be built by one contracting party:

"Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy may build any or all of the vessels herein authorized in such navy-yards as he may designate, and shall build any of the vessels herein authorized in such navy-yards as he may designate, should it reasonably appear that the persons, firms, or corporations, or the agents thereof, bidding for the construction of any of said vessels, have entered into any combination, agreement, or understanding, the effect, object, or purpose of which is to deprive the Government of fair, open, and unrestricted competition in letting contracts for the construction of any of said vessels."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 73, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 69 of the bill, line 12, after the word "tested," strike out the word "before;" and the Senate agree to the same.

EUGENE HALE,
GEORGE C. PERKINS,
BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
GEORGE E. FOSS,
ALSTON G. DAYTON,
FARISH C. TATE,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 6702) granting a pension to Emily Lawrence Reed.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 14105) to amend section 1754 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the preference in civil appointments of persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 7414) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for suitable buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 1488) for the relief of T. A. Woodress;

A bill (H. R. 12199) to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States; and

A bill (H. R. 17026) granting a pension to Jerome W. Turner.

The above message was received during the reading of the preceding conference report.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask that the matter now under consideration may be temporarily laid aside, and that the bill (H. R. 14105) to amend section 1754 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the preference in civil appointments of persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service which has just come from the House of Representatives may be laid before the Senate.

Mr. KEAN. I hope not, Mr. President.

Mr. TELLER. Let us finish the conference report.

Mr. HALE. We can not delay the conference report.

Mr. FORAKER. I beg pardon.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17493) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 4, 5, 15, 17, 26, 33, 34, 40, 44, 50, 55, 94, 119, and 136.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 16, 18, 19, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 41, 42, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 51, 52, 53, 54, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, and 137.

And agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 20, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"For the following sums, under the act entitled 'An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1903, namely:

"Jacksonville, Fla., post-office and custom-house: For commencement of building, $50,000.
"For the acquisition of square No. 143 in the city of Washington, D. C., as a site for the hall of records, $400,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.
"To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to have preliminary plans prepared for a hall of records, $5,000. Said plans shall not be upon a basis of construction of a building involving a total cost exceeding $2,000,000, and no plan shall be adopted unless authorized by legislation hereafter to be enacted, and said plan or any compensation connected therewith shall only be preliminary and shall not in any way run with the construction of the building, and no obligation for such preliminary plans shall be incurred to cost in excess of $5,000 herein appropriated."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 43, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment after the word "directed," in line 12, and insert in lieu of the matter striken out the following: "to report the same to Congress for its action;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 68, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Salaries, Department of Justice: For payment of the salary of the disbursing clerk from March 1 to June 30, 1903, inclusive, at the rate of $2,750 per year instead of the rate of $2,300, $150;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 135, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 43 of the amendment, in line 24, strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five;" and on page 43 of the amendment strike out line 25 and on page 44 strike out lines 1 and 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"For compensation, to be fixed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, of such special agents in the Bureau of Corporations and for per diem, subject to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may prescribe, in lieu of subsistence, at a rate not exceeding $4 per day to each of said special agents while absent from their homes on duty, and for actual necessary traveling expenses for said special agents, including necessary sleeping-car fares, $60,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

EUGENE HALE,
W. B. ALLISON,
H. M. TELLER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
J. G. CANNON,
S. S. BARNEY,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate take a recess——

Mr. QUAY. Just hold on for a moment.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock in the morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. FORAKER. I appeal to the Senator from Maine to withhold the motion just a moment until I can have the bill (H. R. 14105) to amend section 1754 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the preference in civil appointments of persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service, laid before the Senate.

Mr. QUAY. I have the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. HALE. Several Senators have appealed to me to withdraw the motion in order that bills may be taken up. If I do it in one case I will have to do it in several, and therefore I feel constrained to put it to the sense of the Senate whether it is not time now that we take a recess.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. Question.

Mr. QUAY. I have the floor.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Maine is in order and is not debatable.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have a vote.

Mr. FORAKER. I am well aware——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent——

Mr. LODGE. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask the Senator to withhold the motion for a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Pennsylvania desires to withdraw the amendment that he offered to the Philippine tariff bill. There is no objection to it, and it will take no time.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15702) to amend an act entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," approved March 8, 1902.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President. I desire to repeat what I said when I offered the amendment. The circumstances which seemed to me to require the offering of the amendment have——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Collapsed.

Mr. QUAY. Collapsed. There is no longer any occasion for the amendment. I am ready now to have the cerements of the grave thrown around the statehood bill, to remain over it until its resurrection, which will come. I declared, I believe, when I offered the amendment that three States had been knocking at the doors of the Senate and of Congress for admission to statehood and had been denied admission.

I declare here and now, from my knowledge of the conditions, that in the next Congress four States will knock for admission and will be admitted. I desire now to withdraw the amendment which I offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania withdraws the proposed amendment.

RECESS.

Mr. HALE. I renew the motion that the Senate now take a recess until 10 o'clock in the morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine insists upon his motion.

Mr. FORAKER. I again request the Senator from Maine to withhold the motion until the bill which has come from the House may be laid before the Senate.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. That will lead to debate, and objection has already been made. Otherwise I should be glad to yield to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine insists upon his motion.

Mr. PATTERSON. Where will its adoption leave the Philippine tariff bill?

Mr. LODGE. The unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be the unfinished business in the morning. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock in the morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 57 minutes a. m., Wednesday, March 4, 1903) the Senate took a recess until Wednesday, March 4, 1903, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 3, 1903.

[Continuation of the legislative day of Thursday, February 26, 1903.]

The recess having expired, the House, at 11 o'clock a. m., was called to order by the Speaker.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays on the pending question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands the yeas and nays on the pending question. As many as are in favor of ordering the yeas and nays——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I made the point that no quorum was present. I have examined with care the decisions which the Chair referred to on yesterday morning when I made the same point, and I assert now that the decisions by Mr. Carlisle and Mr. Randall mentioned and quoted by the Chair were not at all in cases similar to that which now presents itself to the House. In the case referred to——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman contend that a quorum is needed to order the yeas and nays?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. We have not got to that point, Mr. Speaker, and that is what I desire to present now to the Chair.

In the cases referred to a count was had, under Mr. Carlisle and Mr. Randall. Those demanding the yeas and nays were counted, those opposed were counted, and thereupon the point was made on the floor that no quorum was present, and the Speaker properly decided that a quorum was not necessary to order the yeas and nays. We have not reached the yeas and nays, and, besides, the rules were different then. Mr. Carlisle and Mr. Randall, as the Chair very well knows, would not take notice of a point of "no quorum" when a gentleman arose in his place on the floor and made that point, but would await the ordering of the yeas and nays upon the pending motion and ascertain whether there was a quorum present or not; but under our rules, the rules at present, if a gentleman rises in his place and makes the point of no quorum, the Chair counts.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in those cases to which I have referred—and I am not going to take more than a moment—I want to enter a respectful protest against the ruling yesterday morning, and to show that there is a wide difference in the two cases. In those cases the House was in the conduct of its business, and the fact was developed that there was no quorum. It was while business was being transacted. It was not where the House had been from twelve to twenty-four hours in recess, as in the present instance. The House transacted business yesterday evening after the previous question was ordered on the pending measure upon the conference report now pending.

In this case twelve hours have elapsed since the House was in session, and there is manifestly no quorum present, as we all can see by looking at the House, and the point is made. You can not invoke those old decisions, made under rules totally different in principle from the rules which obtain in this House, in order to sustain the present condition.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to suggest to the gentleman that the ordering of the yeas and nays does not require a quorum. A parallel example is that the vote on a motion to adjourn does not require a quorum, and the gentleman could not be heard upon a point of order, or at least the point of order could not be sustained if the motion was to adjourn, because that motion does not require a quorum, and we could go on with the vote. Now, this is precisely similar.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I yielded for a question. I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. PAYNE. A suggestion, I said, and I will finish what I have to say in this sentence: The ordering of the yeas and nays does not require a quorum, and therefore the Chair was entirely right in putting that question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, one moment in reply. The gentleman goes upon the idea that there has been a count for the yeas and nays. Why, there has been no such thing. We have not got to that point. I made the point of no quorum before the gentleman demanded the yeas and nays. He can not come then and make a motion or a demand for the yeas and nays. After I make the point of no quorum the gentleman can not come in and make a motion then which does not require a quorum, and invoke a rule of that kind, and say that he has made a motion that does not require a quorum. I made the point of no quorum. There was no motion pending. I had a right to make it, and the Chair, under the rules of this House, will count for a quorum when that point is made. Therefore I say the situation is wholly different. I know that the two positions are clearly to be differentiated, and are not the same in principle.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman overlooks the fact that you can order the yeas and nays with or without a quorum. The yeas and nays have been demanded. If there turns out to be a quorum, that will be sufficient. If there are not sufficient here to make a quorum, we will have to get them in. That is all. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I made the point before the yeas and nays were demanded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair, and I insist that it is a meritorious appeal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules it as dilatory.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The Chair has the power to do that, but I have a right, nevertheless, to appeal or pray for an appeal; and I insist that the Chair overrule it in order, and not overrule it with the gavel.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not using the gavel excepting for its necessary purposes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I insist that the Chair was doing so and that he paid no attention to my appeal.

Several MEMBERS on the Republican side. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The appeal is overruled as clearly dilatory.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I deny that it is dilatory, but I recognize the power of the Chair to do it.

The SPEAKER. As many as are in favor of taking this vote by the yeas and nays will rise and remain standing until they are counted.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report. As many as are in favor will, as their names are called, vote "aye," those who are opposed will vote "no," and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the Chair be kind enough to state what is the pending question?

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report on the immigration bill. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 194, nays 11, answered "present" 19, not voting 127; as follows:

RESIGNATION OF MEMBER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March, 3, 1903.

Hon. DAVID B. HENDERSON,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I hereby resign as a member of the Fifty-seventh Congress of the United States.

L. HEISLER BALL,
Representative for District of Delaware.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 7425. An act authorizing and empowering the Secretary of War to locate a right of way for and granting the same and a right to operate and maintain a line of railroad through the Vancouver Barracks and Military Reservation, in the State of Washington, to the Northern Pacific Railway Company; and

S. 7445. An act to provide for the appointment of a district judge for the western judicial district of South Carolina, and for other purposes.

ADAM STUBER.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill S. 5118, printed in the RECORD on February 21, page 2661.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 5118) granting an increase of pension to Adam Stuber, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment.

A. B. DARRAGH,
HENRY R. GIBSON,
JOS. B. CROWLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. H. GALLINGER,
J. R. BURTON,
GEO. TURNER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I call for the statement.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

This bill (S. 5118) passed the Senate at $30 per month, but was amended in the House to $24 per month. Your conferees recommend that the House recede from its amendment. The result of this action will be to restore the rate of the bill, viz, $30 per month, as it originally passed the Senate.

A. B. DARRAGH,
HENRY R. GIBSON,
JOS. B. CROWLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that this soldier——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. May we have order, so that we can hear?

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. GIBSON. I wish to state, Mr. Speaker, that this soldier served in the war with Mexico for seventeen months, and afterwards served as captain in the war of the rebellion, where he contracted rheumatism to such an extent that he was forced to resign. The soldier now is so disabled as to need the attendance of another person. The bill passed the Senate at $30. The House cut down the $30 to $24, but on conference we agreed to restore the $30; and so the bill now stands before the House pensioning this veteran of two wars at $30 a month. If any gentleman desires to say anything to the contrary, I will yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recognized.

Mr. GIBSON. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want five minutes.

Mr. GIBSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman, reserving, of course, the balance of my time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, last night, when the bill which has just been passed recodifying the immigration laws of this country was before the House for debate, it was impossible for me to secure time to state my objection to the passage of the bill, and I now desire to let the RECORD show why I believe the bill should not have been passed. We passed a bill in the House over a year ago changing the immigration laws of this country. In that bill were several paragraphs providing for an educational test for immigrants coming into the United States. There were other clauses in the bill designed to protect the American laborer against the pauper labor of Europe. That bill went to the Senate of the United States, and there, for the balance of the first session of Congress, slept in the pigeonholes of the Senate committee. Afterwards it was reported to the Senate. For weeks it was considered without the possibility of taking a vote upon it, and in the last hours of this Congress it is railroaded through the Senate and railroaded through this House without the possibility for an intelligent consideration by any member of either body of Congress.

Now, I do not claim that the bill as it came to this House is a very obnoxious bill, but I do say that when we enacted this bill into law and left out all the provisions of the bill that protect the American laborer against the pauper labor of Europe we have lost our opportunity for a decade to come to do justice to the men who earn their bread by their daily toil. The House has absolutely surrendered the rights of these men. You say that you protect the American laborer by your tariff laws. You protect him against pauper-made goods of Europe; and yet, by your action to-day you have surrendered the bill that you passed last year in his interest, and opened the sluice gates at every port in this country for the pauper labor of Europe to come in touch with him in his daily life on the American continent every day he lives, and have fixed it so that for Congresses yet to come no relief can be granted to him. By what you have done you have pulled down the American standard of living, you have pulled down the American standard of wages, you have pulled down the home of the American laborer, and I want my protest against such action to stand in the records of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield five minutes to me?

Mr. GIBSON. I have only three minutes, and I will yield the gentleman one minute and a half.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I believe this to be a meritorious bill and shall cheerfully vote for it. I take this minute and a half for the purpose of showing to this House the responsibility for the failure of legislation of this kind in eighteen or twenty very meritorious cases that have been reported by the Invalid Pensions Committee, which must necessarily fail by reason of the circumstances that now operate in this House. Whose fault is it?

Several MEMBERS on the Republican side. Yours.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. No; it is not our fault; it is not the fault of the minority. Day before yesterday when the omnibus public-building bill came in, in which we all had a little pork, we could easily get a rule from your Committee on Rules to put it through; and if you gentlemen on the other side of the House were the real friends of the soldiers of your districts that you claim to be, your Committee on Rules would make a report on the resolution offered by the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee seeking to take up this class of legislation. You can legislate when you want to, and when you do not want to you try to put the responsibility on us, but can not shift it. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that I may be permitted to put that report in my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that he may extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. PAYNE. I shall have to object to that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Always the friend of the old soldiers, as usual. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, the argument of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] against increasing the pension of this soldier may be conclusive from his standpoint, but I hope it has not seriously affected the House, and therefore I call for a vote.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Will not the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GIBSON. I have no time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I find a resolution here to which, I think, the attention of the gentleman ought to be called.

Mr. GIBSON. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Why does he not bring in a resolution to the Committee on Rules to present these matters "en bloc," as we have the others?

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman support such a resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. We will support the legislation when it is brought in.

Mr. GIBSON. If you will support it upon that side, I will try to get the Committee on Rules to report it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I invite the gentleman to do so.

Mr. GIBSON. All right; shake hands across the bloody chasm. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee demanded a division.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (while the House was dividing). Mr. Speaker, that there may be no misunderstanding, I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 210, nays 6, answered "present" 25, not voting 14; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. BARNES, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On March 2, 1903:

H. R. 7864. An act to pay John F. Lawson $237.96, balance due him for services as United States mail carrier.

On March 3, 1903:

H. R. 13605. An act for the relief of George A. Detchemendy; and

H. R. 14384. An act to establish a life-saving station at the mouth of Black River, at or near the city of Lorain, in the State of Ohio.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill. While this report is being considered in the House I am delayed in going into the conference on the deficiency bill. Therefore I should be glad to have this report considered as speedily as possible. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the report and to read in lieu thereof the statement of the House conferees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SHERMAN). Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I should be glad to oblige the gentleman; but it is now so late in the session that the only way we can understand amendments is to hear them read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There is.

Mr. CANNON. I should be glad to give the gentleman from Tennessee any information he may desire about any amendment.

Mr. BOWIE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not interrupt the reading of a conference report for a question of privilege unless it is something arising during the proceedings at the moment.

The report of the conference committee was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17202) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 10, 11, 14, 15, 19, 23, 24, 26, 27, 30, 31, 39, 42, 43, 44, 48, 51, 52, 53, 54, 57, 58, 59, 63, 65, 76, 77, 80, 85, 88, 97, 98, 99, 107, 109, 116, 117, 120, 123, 126, and 140.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 6, 9, 12, 16, 17, 18, 20, 21, 22, 25, 28, 29, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 38, 40, 41, 45, 47, 49, 55, 56, 61, 62, 64, 66, 67, 68, 73, 74, 75, 78, 81, 82, 83, 84, 86, 87, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 95, 96, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 118, 121, 122, 125, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 138, 139, 142, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 150, and 151, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 13: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of the matter inserted by said amendment, after the word "dollars," insert the following: ", which sum shall be expended in such manner and under such plans as will complete in every detail each and every object mentioned in this paragraph;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 37: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$205,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 46: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 46, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$95,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 50: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$30,240;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 60: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 60, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$45,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 69: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 69, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "; and a contract is hereby authorized to be entered into for such machinery, appliances, and furniture, complete in every detail for the operation of said mint, at a total cost not exceeding $225,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 70: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 70, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, amended as follows: Insert after the word "entry," at the end of said amendment, the following: "; but this proviso shall not apply to persons embraced in article 3 of the treaty with China of 1894;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 71: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 71, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In line 11 of the matter inserted by said amendment, before the word ": Provided," insert ", which sum, including the amount herein appropriated, shall be paid one-half out of the Treasury of the United States and one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia;" and, after the word "same," at the end of said amendment, insert the following: ": Provided further, That the trustees of Howard University shall be required to supply all medical and surgical service without cost to the United States or the District of Columbia;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 72: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 72, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$295,950;" and at the end of the amended paragraph, after the word "available," insert the following: ", of which sum not exceeding $7,000 may be used for models, but nothing in this appropriation shall be considered as initiating any change in the east front of the Capitol or in any way committing Congress to the same;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 79: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 79, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$375,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 94: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 94, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,126,920;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 108: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 108, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Watertown Arsenal, Watertown, Mass.: For lavatory and water-closet for shops, $3,500."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 110: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 110, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$80;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 111: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 111, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$480;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 112: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 112, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$80;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 113: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 113, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$480;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 114: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 114, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$80;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 115: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 115, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$4,240;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 119: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 119, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,500,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 127: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 127, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "for one barrack, $55,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 128: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 128, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$640,600;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 137: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 137, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$4,902,808;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 141: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 141, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"In order to provide for the new examination authorized by Article IX of the award of the tribunal of arbitration constituted by treaty of Washington, February 29, 1892, and made by the arbitrators at Paris, August 16, 1893, to be made by and under the direction of the Secretary of State, $20,000, to be immediately available."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 143: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 143, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"To enable the President to cooperate through diplomatic channels with the Governments of Mexico, China, Japan, and other countries, for the purpose set forth in the message of the President and accompanying notes submitted to Congress January 29, 1903, and printed as Senate Document No. 119, second session Fifty-seventh Congress, $25,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 149: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 149, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the name "Mrs. Emma Cadwallader Guild" insert the following: ", to be placed in the Senate wing of the Capitol;" and the Senate agree to the same.

J. G. CANNON,
J. A. HEMENWAY,
THOS. C. McRAE,
Managers on the part of the House.

W. B. ALLISON,
EUGENE HALE,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17202) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report on each of the Senate amendments, namely:

On No. 1: Appropriates $5,000, as proposed by the Senate, for addition to quarters now occupied by the subtreasury at Baltimore, Md.

On No. 2: Appropriates $52,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $49,279, as proposed by the House, for rent of temporary quarters for Government officials at Cleveland, Ohio.

On Nos. 3 and 4: Strikes out the appropriation proposed by the Senate of $350,000 for extending the two wings of the immigrant station building on Ellis Island, New York.

On No. 5: Strikes out the appropriation of $2,000,000 proposed by the Senate for the purchase of a site for a post-office building in the city of New York.

On No. 6: Inserts the provision proposed by the Senate authorizing the use of a part of the arsenal grounds in Pittsburg, Pa., for a marine hospital.

On No. 7: Strikes out the provision proposed by the Senate authorizing the use of $2,000 for repairs to the wharf at Wilmington, N. C., the same being provided for in the deficiency bill.

On No. 8: Strikes out the appropriation of $1,000 proposed by the Senate for a laboratory for the Marine-Hospital Service, the same being provided for in the deficiency bill.

On No. 9: Appropriates $50,000, as proposed by the Senate, for a quarantine station at Portland, Me.

On No. 10: Strikes out the appropriation of $2,000 proposed by the Senate for coal bunkers for steamer at the Reedy Island quarantine station.

On No. 11: Strikes out the appropriation of $7,000 proposed by the Senate for the Gulf quarantine station.

On No. 12: Appropriates $6,000, as proposed by the Senate, for the quarantine station at San Diego, Cal.

On No. 13: Appropriates $80,000, as proposed by the Senate, for the quarantine station at Honolulu, Hawaii.

On Nos. 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, and 36: Makes appropriations for light-house aids to navigation, additional to those contained in the bill as it passed the House, as follows: Reenacts, as proposed by the Senate, the existing provision for the Broad Sound Channel light station, in Boston Harbor, Massachusetts, without increasing the limit of cost of the station; makes appropriations of $90,000 for relief light vessel for the Third light-house district; $29,000 for Pecks Ledge light and fog-signal station, Connecticut; $90,000 for Five Fathom Bank light vessel, New York; $90,000 for Cape Lookout Shoals light vessel, North Carolina; $90,000 for Heald Bank light vessel, Texas; $75,000 for Racine Reef light and fog-signal station, Wisconsin; $30,000 for relief light vessel for the Ninth and Eleventh light-house districts; $54,100 for Spectacle Reef light station, Michigan; $25,000 for Middle Island, Michigan, light and fog-signal station; $75,000 for tender for St. Marys River, Michigan; $15,000 for Piedras Blancas light station, California; and $90,000 for Blunts Reef light vessel, Pacific Ocean off Cape Mendocino, California.

On No. 37: Appropriates $205,000, instead of $225,000 as proposed by the Senate, and $190,000 as proposed by the House, for expenses of fog signals.

On No. 38: Appropriates $8,000, as proposed by the Senate, for telegraph or telephone connection with Plum Island life-saving station, Wisconsin.

On No. 39: Strikes out appropriation of $70,000 proposed by the Senate for constructing a sailing vessel with auxiliary steam power for the Revenue-Cutter Service.

On No. 40: Appropriates $200,000, as proposed by the Senate, for a revenue cutter for the coast of Maine.

On No. 41: Appropriates $20,000, as proposed by the Senate, for completion of revenue cutter for service at the port of Philadelphia.

On No. 42: Strikes out the appropriation of $30,000 proposed by the Senate for a site for a depot for the Revenue-Cutter Service.

On No. 43: Strikes out the appropriation of $40,000 proposed by the Senate for a depot for the Revenue-Cutter Service in the harbor of Oakland, Cal.

On No. 44: Strikes out the appropriation of $7,000 proposed by the Senate for publishing contributions from the United States National Herbarium.

On No. 45: Authorizes, as proposed by the Senate, the construction of a building for the National Museum, to cost not exceeding $3,500,000, and appropriates $250,000 therefor.

On No. 46: Appropriates $95,000, instead of $100,000 as proposed by the Senate, and $90,000, as proposed by the House, for the National Zoological Park.

J. G. CANNON,
J. A. HEMENWAY,
THOS. C. McRAE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the conference report has been read and also the statement of the House conferees. The House is now fully informed, I think, and unless some gentleman has some question to ask upon the merits of this matter I shall ask for a vote.

Mr. LESSLER and Mr. McCLELLAN rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield, and to whom?

Mr. CANNON. As two gentlemen from New York have risen, I will yield first to one and then to the other.

Mr. CREAMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for order. This is an important question, and we wish to hear.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order.

Mr. LESSLER. Mr. Speaker, in view of the situation in which the House last session left the question of a new post-office building for New York City, I should like the gentleman from Illinois to explain why the conferees of the House have not concurred in Senate amendment No. 5, appropriating $2,000,000 for the purchase of the site.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That was the question I wished to ask.

Mr. CANNON. Then I will reply to the question of both gentlemen, or the question of one adopted by the other.

The proposition to purchase a site for an additional post-office from the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, at its terminal, and, as I understand, to be occupied jointly in part with that company, the proposed price being $2,000,000, never reached the House of Representatives. We never investigated it and had no knowledge about it. It did not reach the Senate until after this bill had been reported to the Senate with the amendments of the Senate committee and while it was actually being considered. "On the run," as it were, the Senate put the amendment into this bill.

When we went into conference a gentleman who spoke, or professed to speak, in the interest of the New York Central Railroad Company, informed us that that company also had a site at its terminal, as it is to be, that it wanted to dispose of to the Government for a post-office in view of the construction of its great terminal, and the application was made to the committee to see whether that matter could not also be treated. It was found on investigation that that proposition was not in conference, and, getting all the light that it was possible for us to get in the closing hours of the session, the conferees on the part of the House—being, I think, quite as wise and knowing quite as much upon this question as the Senate conferees—found themselves in a fog. We did not know exactly of what we were to authorize the purchase; we did not know and could not ascertain substantially of what we were to authorize the purchase, either from the Pennsylvania Railroad Company or from the New York Central.

Therefore, not knowing in the first place whether we wanted to buy this terminal property; not knowing whether it was worth $2,000,000 or $1,000,000 (a suggestion being made to us that we could buy the New York Central terminal site for $1,000,000); not knowing whether we wanted one only or both; not knowing the kind of building which it was proposed to erect; not knowing whether it would be a post-office site, principally for the benefit of the United States and at the same time a benefit to the terminals of the respective companies (a benefit to the Government on the one hand and to the railway on the other); in this blissful state of ignorance, catching the matter "on the run" in the closing hours, we asked: "Will these terminals be completed before Congress comes together again?" And the answer came, "No." That was the only positive thing we could get, and we said: "This matter can for the present go out of the bill, and when Congress shall again meet, it being duly advised and having duly investigated, it can take the whole subject up next December and dispose of it upon its merits." That is the whole story.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a couple of minutes? I am very much interested in this question.

Mr. CANNON. I can not yield for a speech.

Mr. LESSLER. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether, under the provisions of the bill of last year, there was not appointed a committee, consisting of the Postmaster-General, the Attorney-General, and the Secretary of the Treasury, and whether that committee has not reported in favor of a site?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, the report comes from them, as I have indicated, never to the House and never to the Senate, while this bill was being prepared, and for the first time while it was being considered in the Senate, and is not sufficient—in my judgment, was not—to authorize action upon the part of the conferees, and in my judgment upon the part of Congress.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman from Illinois controls ten minutes' time, and I courteously ask him to yield me two minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I will not yield. Does the gentleman desire to ask a question?

Mr. SULZER. I do; and I desire to say something.

Mr. CANNON. Ask the question and I will then ask for a vote. What is it?

Mr. SULZER. My question is this: The Democrats in this House from the city of New York have earnestly, faithfully, and consistently for the last six years, to my personal knowledge, been endeavoring by every possible way to get a new post-office in the city of New York. It is acknowledged by every person familiar with the situation that there is an urgent demand and necessity for such a new post-office——

Mr. CANNON. It is a long question. [Laughter.]

Mr. SULZER. And it seems that after we have finally got the commission, and the commission has selected the site, and Congress is now ready to appropriate two millions to pay for the site, and the work is to begin, the gentleman from Illinois has stricken out the appropriation of $2,000,000, and he is responsible for it, and I want——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield to anybody. This is not a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield to anybody on the floor of this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee has risen to a point of order. Will the gentleman state it?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The point of order I make is that we are to have ten minutes' time for debate on this report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman correctly states the fact.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But the ten minutes have not been consumed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is correct, but the gentleman from Illinois is in control of the time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If nobody is to be recognized he can not demand a vote at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has ten minutes. No vote has been demanded. The gentleman from Illinois had ten minutes' time and there are about three minutes remaining. The gentleman from Illinois is in control of that time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be protected by the Chair! [Laughter.]

Mr. MCRAE rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MCRAE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. As soon as I take one minute I will.

Mr. MCRAE. I would like to have one or two minutes of the time before the gentleman gives it all away.

Mr. CANNON. I have how much time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Three minutes and a half.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I trust the Chair did not take from my ten minutes the interruption of the gentlemen from New York [Mr. SULZER] against everybody's protest.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair certainly did. The gentleman yielded to him for a question.

Mr. CANNON. But I tried to shut him off, and he would not be shut off. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cooperated with the gentleman in the effort, but together we were not successful.

Mr. CANNON. I yield one minute to my colleague on the conference committee, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE].

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I only want this minute for the purpose of saying that I assume my share of the responsibility for this report, and particularly for adhering to the disagreement of the House on this amendment No. 5, and in doing so I state to the House, and especially to those on this side, that I believe that the amendment ought not to have been agreed to by the conference committee. In the first place, this is not the proper bill nor the regular way to consider such an important public building. In the second place, it involves $2,000,000, and the location of a post-office at the terminal of only one railroad running into that city, and that road only controls 40 per cent of the mail that goes into New York; whereas 60 per cent is yet to be provided for if the method proposed for handling it is to be adopted. I do not believe in voting away the public money by such items in appropriation bills when proper consideration can not be given them, and if there is any criticism to be made for rejecting this amendment I am willing to stand up and assume, with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY], my share of the responsibility for not agreeing to it. [Applause.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I just want——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SULZER. Just one word.

Mr. CANNON. Not one ten-thousandth part of a word. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. CANNON. I yield one-half minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DOUGLAS].

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to use the brief time allowed me to express my protest and feeling of sincere regret that the chairman of the committee has not seen fit to give us this appropriation. Personally I spent a great deal of time in endeavoring to find out the views and ideas of the commission, and they seemed to heartily favor and indorse the plan. The intention was that the Pennsylvania site should only be a branch to expedite the mails with large floor space, and the New York Central site—I obtained the information from Postmaster-General Payne—was to give us a central branch post-office for mail purposes and the people's benefit; and while I do not question but that the chairman acted in all sincerity, it is a great pity another year is lost before action can be taken on a matter so important to New York City and the country generally——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask for order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I have already covered the ground touching the amendment referred to. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] on the conference report has also covered the ground.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I understood the Chair to say that the gentleman's ten minutes had expired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; the Chair did not so announce.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] criticises. He always thunders in the index. His form never has darkened the doors of the Committee on Appropriations of the House touching this or any other site for the New York post-office. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I now ask for a vote.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that his committee never had anything to do with this appropriation until it was put on the bill in the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Division. The noes were not submitted at all.

Mr. PAYNE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 241, nays 11, answered "present" 12, not voting 86; as follows:

CLAIMS OF CERTAIN CITIZENS OF VIRGINIA FOR DAMAGES TO THEIR PROPERTY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following veto message of the President; which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 9632, entitled "An act for the allowance of claims of certain citizens of Virginia for damages to their property incident to the encampment at Manassas and march from Camp Alger to Thoroughfare Gap, Virginia, as recommended by a board of officers appointed for the consideration of claims for damages to property by volunteer soldiers during the war with Spain," with a view to having it reconsidered and amended.

Attention is invited to the accompanying letter and statement of the Quartermaster-General of the Army.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, March 3, 1903.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9632) for the allowance of claims of certain citizens of Virginia for damages to their property incident to the encampment at Manassas and march from Camp Alger to Thoroughfare Gap, Va., as recommended by a board of officers appointed for the consideration of claims for damages to property by volunteer soldiers during the war with Spain.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to claimants in this act named the several sums appropriated herein, the same being in full for and the receipt of the same to be taken and accepted in each case as a full and final release and discharge of their respective claims, namely:

Mr. HEATWOLE with Mr. STEPHENS of Texas.

Mr. HOLLIDAY with Mr. SNOOK.

Mr. JENKINS with Mr. NORTON.

Mr. VREELAND with Mr. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] voted?

The SPEAKER. He has not.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Then I wish to withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama, and he answered "present," as above recorded.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair lays before the House the following concurrent resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Committee on Enrolled Bills, in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 12199) to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States, are hereby authorized and directed to correct the cross references by sections in said bill, made necessary by the changed numbering of the sections thereof, namely:

Page 3, lines 2 and 3, strike out "thirty-three" and insert "thirty-two."

Page 6, line 23, strike out "five" and insert "four."

Page 8, line 5, strike out "five" and insert "four."

Page 8, line 11, strike out "six" and insert "five."

Page 9, line 4, strike out "six" and insert "five."

Page 13, line 7, strike out "thirteen, fourteen, and fifteen" and insert "twelve, thirteen, and fourteen."

Page 13, line 14, strike out "thirteen, fourteen, and fifteen" and insert "twelve, thirteen, and fourteen."

Page 16, line 13, strike out "five and six" and insert "four and five."

Page 18, line 5, strike out "twenty" and insert "nineteen."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Immigration, that these errors may be corrected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question has been asked for, and that is the pending question. If the previous question is negatived, the gentleman can then make his motion.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I make the point that the motion to refer takes precedence over the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion for the previous question has precedence over the motion to refer.

While the question was being taken,

Mr. STEELE. Let us have the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 140, nays 68, answered "present" 18, not voting 124; as follows:

So the previous question was ordered.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. VAN VOORHIS with Mr. GOLDFOGLE.

Mr. YOUNG with Mr. WILEY.

On this vote:

Mr. KNOX with Mr. STEPHENS of Texas.

Mr. DOVENER with Mr. PUGSLEY.

Mr. POWERS of Maine with Mr. RUSSELL.

The result of the vote was announced, as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is now on agreeing to the concurrent resolution of the Senate.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I desire to say something in opposition to this resolution. As I understand, the rule allows twenty minutes for debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee demands recognition in opposition——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This is a resolution that has not been debated; and under Rule XXVIII, paragraph 3, the right of debate under such circumstances is allowed for twenty minutes on each side, after the ordering of the previous question, on all questions or propositions upon which there has been no debate. Of course upon this resolution there has been no debate. This concurrent resolution involves a new question which has not been debated, and therefore under paragraph 3 of Rule XXVIII I have the right to be heard on it for twenty minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to a ruling made in the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, wherein it was held that "debate meant debate upon the main proposition and not upon anything incidentally connected therewith."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Of course, I recognize that rule. I know, for instance, that where a question has been debated in Committee of the Whole it has been held that when we get into the House, debate having occurred in Committee of the Whole, further debate is not allowed after the previous question is ordered. But this is a new proposition; it is one we have not had before; it is not incidental to the immigration bill. I insist that we ought to be allowed debate on this new proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair further calls the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to a ruling in the Congress just cited, wherein it was held that—

The previous question having been ordered on a conference report relating to a subject which had been debated in the House before being sent to a conference, it was held that the forty minutes of debate should not be allowed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Precisely; but that does not cover this case. I am contending that this is a new proposition——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Oh, no.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee (continuing). An independent proposition, which has not been considered before. It presents new questions entirely, and can not come within the rule which the Chair has invoked.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not agree with the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Has the Chair read paragraph 3 of Rule XXVIII, which is as broad as the English language can make it? It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we are certainly entitled to debate this proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is perfectly clear to the Chair that this is a proposition which has been debated. The present proposition is merely the correction of a clerical error in the conference report; it is not a new subject, but is a subject which has been debated. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Has there been any debate on correcting this error, or these errors? There has not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's point is overruled. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair overruling my point of order.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point that that is dilatory.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is perfectly clear to the Chair that there is no other purpose in the appeal than to consume time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The Chair is very much mistaken in ascribing that motive to me, when I say that I desire to debate this proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The Chair can do that, but he ought not to give a wrong reason.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I call for a division.

Mr. PAYNE. In order to save time, I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 201, nays 18, answered "present" 11, not voting 120; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, ordered printed, and referred to the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State covering a statement showing the receipts and disbursements of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Company for the month of January, 1903, furnished by the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Commission in pursuance of section 11 of the "Act to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the purchase of the Louisiana Territory," etc., approved March 3, 1901.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, March 3, 1903.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, ordered printed, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress a report by the architects, with accompanying pictures, regarding the work of repairing and refurnishing the White House and the erection of the Executive office building.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, February 28, 1903.

RAILROAD THROUGH VANCOUVER BARRACKS AND MILITARY RESERVATION IN THE STATE OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and take from the Speaker's table and pass the bill (S. 7445) authorizing and empowering the Secretary of War to locate a right of way for and granting the same and a right to operate and maintain a line of railroad through the Vancouver Barracks and Military Reservation in the State of Washington to the Portland, Vancouver and Yakima Railway Company, its successors and assigns, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and empowered to locate a right of way, not exceeding 100 feet in width, through the lands of the Vancouver Barracks and Military Reservation if in his judgment it can be done in such a manner as not to interfere with the uses of said reservation for military purposes by the United States; and when said right of way shall be so located it is hereby granted during the pleasure of Congress to the Portland, Vancouver and Yakima Railroad, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Washington, its successors and assigns, for the purpose of constructing a railroad and telegraph line thereon: Provided, That the said right of way and the width and location thereof through said lands, the compensation therefor, and the regulations for operating said railroad within the limits of the said military reservation so as to prevent all damage to public property or for public uses shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War prior to any entry upon said lands or the commencement of the construction of said works: Provided also, That whenever said right of way shall cease to be used for the purposes aforesaid the same shall revert to the United States.

SEC 2. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects, and the Chair appoints to tell the House the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. STEVENS, and the gentleman from Texas, Mr. SLAYDEN.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 1.

Accordingly, a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] in support of the bill and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] in opposition.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to authorize the Secretary of War to locate a right of way not exceeding 100 feet in width through the lands of the Vancouver Barracks and Reservation if in his judgment it can be done without interfering with that reservation for any military purposes, and if a right of way can be so located it is granted, during the pleasure of Congress, to the Portland, Vancouver and Yakima Railway Company. Before that company can proceed with any construction it must file its plans as provided by law, and the Secretary of War shall prescribe the regulations, rules, and compensation for the construction, operation, and maintenance before any commencement of this work can be had.

This bill has been submitted to the Secretary of War. He has suggested certain amendments to protect the interests of the United States. Those amendments have all been adopted. The bill has been unanimously reported by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, by the House Committee on Military Affairs, and no one has reported any objection.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves the balance of his time. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, digressing from the then pending measure a day or two ago, I took occasion to allude to the sale of some relics that have long adorned the White House, and I then, as now, denounced the act. I said a valuable and historic mirror I knew had been sold, and some relics given President Jackson, and a sideboard given Mrs. President Hayes. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] stated that he did not believe that this sideboard had been so sold. That is what he said in substance. Now, I want to say that, as a matter of fact, that sideboard has been identified, not only by Mr. Hayes, the son of President and Mrs. Hayes, who has offered Mr. Frank, who now owns it, several hundred dollars for it, but Mr. Frank, a few moments ago, came here to the door and called for me and several others, and stated that he has it in his possession and that he is in receipt of letters from the Art School at Cincinnati, where the article was made, and that the letters describe it exactly. In addition to that, the Cincinnati Enquirer had a photograph taken of this sideboard, now in Mr. Joseph M. Frank's saloon, the "Washington Brewery," in the city of Washington, and had that picture sent to Cincinnati, where it was compared with the picture of the article taken before it was sent to the White House in 1877. The original was taken by Mr. Fry, the artist who carved it, and the two pictures are exactly alike, so the Enquirer and Mr. John R. McLean inform me. So there is no question in the world about the identity of the article.

Mr. Speaker, without further taking up the time of the House I desire to read an article from the Cincinnati Enquirer, which gives a history of this sideboard. It was presented along in November, 1877. It describes it minutely. Of course, gentlemen, you understand that there should not be any politics in this. The other day, I think through a misunderstanding, you made politics of it. I know a great many of you have expressed regret to me that you voted against my resolution that I introduced, calling on Colonel Bingham to make a statement to Congress, telling us what he sold and what he had not sold of the relics. Now, I will tell you what has occurred.

This morning I received a letter from Mr. Patterson, of Pennsylvania, the grandson of Gen. Robert Patterson, who presented to President Andrew Jackson some relics which this gentleman, Mr. Frank, tells me he bought. Only a few minutes ago he told me that he had sold them to a very distinguished citizen of the city of Washington, who has completed a mansion where he proposes to put them. Mr. Patterson has written to me, thanking me for the speech I made here Saturday alluding to the Patterson relics. He also wrote to his friend, Representative PATTERSON of Pennsylvania, calling on him to please run down these relics, so that he and his sisters might buy them, I presume. They were here a few days ago, the ladies members of the D. A. R., rejoicing in the history of our country and the history of Jackson and Armstrong and Monroe and Washington and Jefferson, and all the other American idols whose names are no more to be hemmed in by State lines than their patriotism is capable of being circumscribed within the same narrow limits. This gentleman (Mr. Frank) said, "Mr. GAINES, it was a shame to sell those things. Every one of them has a history that is dear to the heart of somebody in the United States."

Now, gentlemen, you have made politics out of this. You have voted down my resolution, and I want to read an editorial from a Pennsylvania paper on that point:

[Harrisburg Star-Independent, Monday, March 2, 1903.]

THE GAINES RESOLUTION.

Just why the Republicans in Congress have elected to oppose any investigation of the charge that White House relics have been sold or destroyed it is hard to say. The matter is not strictly a partisan one, though, of course, it is possible to make a political issue out of it. Great church schisms have been caused by differences over the depth of an obeisance, a woman's smile has been known to cause a bloody war, and a Congress that is willing to unseat a Congressman in order that another man might be given $10,000 in salary would doubtless not experience any difficulty in making politics out of much smaller things than gilt candelabra and cold-water sideboards.

Nevertheless this is a matter that should be treated upon its own merits and kept free from all political bias. If the custodians of public property are not properly treating gifts sent by the people to the White House or to any other Government building in Washington the people have a right to know it. Consequently there is no good reason why the Gaines resolution should not be favorably acted upon. It is not even hinted that the actions of the custodians complained of have been anything more than a lack of respect for relics of historic interest, but that, if it be proved, is enough to earn for them public censure.

There must be hundreds of articles scattered about Washington around which are clustered interesting memories, and it is not right that as soon as they get in the road or a change in their surroundings makes them incongruous, they are either put at auction and sold for a pittance or else thrown upon the nearest junk heap. Congress should see that steps are taken to preserve these articles and their histories. To take such an action would not be "descending to diminutives and tracing the whereabouts of second-hand furniture," as Representative GROSVENOR suggested. Nor was Mr. CANNON'S reference to Madison's clothesline relevant.

The inquiry suggested, however, would insure that in the future the Government would observe that courtesy toward the donors of gifts that common politeness and good breeding demands of nations as well as of individuals.

What I want is for Congress not only to go and get these things presented by General Patterson, but those presented by the Art School in Cincinnati; indeed, all those other relics sold from the White House.

Mr. SULZER. Do you not think this is a case for the police?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, I think the police would be very glad to be ordered to find them. I think the American people will police the White House hereafter before they let such a thing as this occur again.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to place this little clipping from the Cincinnati Enquirer in the RECORD, giving a history of this thing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VANDIVER].

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have order for a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Speaker, we have heard much in the last few days about the importance of doing business. We have heard, for instance, from the gentleman from Iowa yesterday that the great supply bills of the Government were being held up, and that the Republican party, the majority of this House, were determined to pass them; they had the power to do so; they intended to do so; and yet he complained that by the action of the minority here the wheels of Government are being clogged.

I want to ask the gentleman to explain if he will, or any member of the majority here to explain if he will, why it is that within the last few days of the session, when it is so important that these great supply bills shall be passed, your party has seen fit to consume a whole legislative day in stealing a Democratic seat in the House and giving it to a Republican? What reason was there for it? You do not even undertake to find out whether there was evidence or not. You did not even read the evidence. There are only two men in the House on the Republican side who even profess to have read it, and they even do not claim to have read all of it.

In the consideration of this election case it is not the mere fact of turning out a Democrat and putting a Republican in in his place, but the method by which it was done, and the unseemly, unjust, and discreditable method by which you explain it.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VANDIVER. Yes, if it is a question.

Mr. MILLER. Have you read the evidence in that case?

Mr. VANDIVER. I have read a great deal of it, a great deal more, I think, than the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. MILLER. I have read all of it, every word of it. Have you read the testimony of Doctor——

Mr. VANDIVER. I will not take further time to answer you now. [Laughter on the Republican side]. I have only five minutes and have something to say myself.

Mr. MILLER. Will you allow me to ask you another question?

Mr. VANDIVER. I decline to yield any further.

Mr. MILLER. Allow me to ask you one question?

Mr. VANDIVER. If it is just a question, ask it.

Mr. MILLER. Have you read the testimony of Dr. Faulkner, who testifies that the police of the city of St. Louis paid $21,000 into the campaign fund of the Democratic party at the last election in that city? You will find it on page 2262 of the record in this case of Butler.

Mr. RUCKER. He never said it.

Mr. MILLER. The receipt for the money is also found upon the same page. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RUCKER. I say it is not true.

Mr. MILLER. I know what is in the record, and unfortunately the gentleman from Missouri does not know.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I ask the gentleman from Missouri to yield to me for a second——

Mr. VANDIVER. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON (continuing). For me to say that the Republican majority of Elections Committee No. 2, in their report, in their discussion, rely not on a syllable of the proposition of the gentleman from Kansas; and he dare not deny it.

Mr. VANDIVER. I decline to yield further. I will read, gentlemen, a little of the evidence, which if the gentleman from Kansas has read he has certainly not comprehended. As to what the police in St. Louis contributed in campaign funds, I have only to say this, that there is no evidence in this case anywhere to show that any contribution went into that district; and I am reliably informed that they did not; and the gentleman's statement is misleading. They contributed to the State campaign, and not the Congressional.

Now, then, further, when he talks again of the result in that district let him consider these facts: First, that it is a Democratic district, and has been Democratic for a whole generation, and that with only three exceptions the Democratic party has always carried it for a quarter of a century.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield to me for another question?

Mr. VANDIVER. I ask that the gentleman allow me two minutes more?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. VANDIVER. I want to say, furthermore, that this is one of the largest and wealthiest districts in the United States; that it has always been represented here by a Democrat with three exceptions. In the canvass of 1896 and 1898 the money question disturbed the politics of that district, and they sent a Republican here—a very creditable and honorable gentleman, I want to say, in Major Pearce, of St. Louis—and only once beside within the last quarter of a century has that district sent a Republican here.

That district has gone Democratic even when your Ziegenheim machine undertook to control the politics of St. Louis, and a dirtier or more shameless administration of city affairs was never known in any State in the Union. Furthermore, let me say to you the explanation of the result in that district in this campaign is clearly brought out in the evidence of a Republican who testified in this case, a prominent Republican of St. Louis, Julius Wurtzberger, who was city collector, and occupied public office for nearly twenty years.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to put this in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON and several members on the Republican side objected.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I now yield the balance of my time—eight minutes—to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Does the gentleman from Missouri want more time?

Mr. VANDIVER. Yes; just a moment.

Mr. LITTLE. I will yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Speaker, here is what Julius Wurtzberger said. The question referred to the nominations in that district and the dissension in the Republican ranks:

Q. Did that have any result in leaving any dissatisfaction in the minds of Republican voters?

A. It demoralized the Republican party to such an extent that the ward in which I had the pleasure to live in, which used to give more plurality than it gave Republican votes at the last election—in other words, at the last election when I was committeeman we had 1,950 plurality, I think, and I believe that is more than the Republican votes that were cast at the last election in that ward.

Q. So that prior to the defection and fight in the committee and the dissatisfaction of the people growing out of that, the ward in which you lived gave a much larger plurality than it polled votes at the last election for the Republican party?

A. Yes, sir; it was absolutely demoralized. People stayed at home and wouldn't vote, wouldn't register, and nothing else.

Q. You were generally cognizant of the political conditions over the city at large, were you not?

A. Yes, sir.

In other words, dissatisfaction primarily in the ranks of your own party accounted largely for the great majority given for Butler in that election. Furthermore, let it be remembered that this committee when they first brought in this case and asked for a day for the consideration of it alleged that there were sixty or more polling places in that district in which a clear 100 votes were added, each one to the Democratic column, but when they came in here, after the evidence is taken, they practically abandoned that charge, and it is as false as every other charge which they have attempted to substantiate here.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, of all the sessions of Congress held since the adoption of the Constitution this session will go down in history as the one incomparable humbug and colossal fraud. Never before has a great political party set about with such deliberation and purpose to humbug the American people and met with such temporary success. But as certain as Holy Writ "your sins will find you out." You have made the pretense of legislating against the trusts, but instead of effective legislation to bridle the trusts in their rapacious raid upon the people you have passed a law which is a fraud and an abortion and only gives the Administration power to advertise the supposed virtues and conceal the crimes of the trusts.

Early in the session it was announced that J. Pierpont Morgan was enraged against the great trust buster in the White House and was threatening his defeat for the coming nomination. But no sooner had the farce of passing this law been consummated than we find Mr. Morgan, Mr. ALDRICH, and one MARCUS A. HANNA in conference with the President, as announced by the city daily press of February 16, in the following item:

MORGAN CALLS ON PRESIDENT—GREAT FINANCIER AMONG YESTERDAY'S VISITORS AT THE WHITE HOUSE.

There were a number of callers at the White House last night, including members of Congress, with whom the President conferred on pending legislative matters. They included Senators HANNA and ALDRICH, who remained with Mr. Roosevelt until nearly 11 o'clock.

Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, who returned to the city from Richmond, Va., shortly before 10 o'clock, also called during the evening. He left the house with Senators HANNA and ALDRICH, going as far as their hotel with them, when he returned to his car at the railroad station, later leaving for New York City.

Strange as it may seem to those not familiar with the ways of the Administration, as soon as this conference with the great king of trusts and monopoly was had we find the following authorized statement made by the Attorney-General on the same day that the conference above was held at the White House. The following is the statement as appearing in the Washington Post February 16, 1903:

PRESIDENT SATISFIED—ATTORNEY-GENERAL TALKS OF THE ANTITRUST LAWS—LONG STRIDE FORWARD MADE—MEASURES DECLARED TO BE ADEQUATE FOR REGULATION OF MONOPOLIES—PROMISES OF LAST FALL SAID TO BE REDEEMED—FAITH EXPRESSED IN THE EFFICIENCY OF THE NEW DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE.

Attorney-General Knox, who is known to have prepared the important features of the antitrust bills now enacted into laws, on being asked as to how they were regarded by the Administration, said:

"The legislation affecting the trusts passed at this session of Congress is satisfactory to the Administration, and the prompt response to the President's requests is highly gratifying. A very long stride in advance has been accomplished, and the promises of last fall have been made good.

"The giving and taking of railroad rebates is now prohibited by a law capable of effective enforcement against corporations as well as individuals, and the courts of the United States are clothed with jurisdiction to restrain and punish violations.

AUTHORITY TO INVESTIGATE.

"The act creating the Department of Commerce vests in that Department complete authority to investigate the organization and business methods of corporations engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and to that end to compel the testimony of persons having the desired knowledge. The legislation is concise in its terms, but very comprehensive in its scope. Under its provisions a fair opportunity will be afforded to test the effect upon the tendency toward industrial monopoly of its guaranties of no favors for the great producer against the small one.

"Discretion is lodged in the President as to the publication of facts useful to be publicly known, and a wise administration of the law promises much that is helpful and nothing that is harmful.

INSURES DECISIONS.

"The law to expedite the hearing of cases and giving an appeal directly to the Supreme Court from the court of first instance assures within a reasonable time authoritative decisions upon important pending questions, in the knowledge of which future legislation, if necessary, can be confidently framed.

"Upon the whole, the situation is eminently satisfactory, and is the result of concessions, modifications of views, and forms of expressions upon the part of many earnest and thoughtful men, who have endeavored within a very brief session to meet a rational public demand in a rational and effective way."

This statement says:

The legislation affecting the trusts passed at this session of Congress is satisfactory to the Administration, and the prompt response to the President's requests is highly gratifying.

Behold the consummation of this fraud and farce. Morgan has been placated, HANNA and Knox are gratified, and the whole thing is satisfactory to the Administration. The Rough Rider in the White House has lost his spurs, and has put on the conservative habits of Morgan and HANNA. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

This combination humbug will be exposed. Trusts and monopoly, feeling secure, will continue to furnish the campaign funds for the Republican party and will renew with relentless greed their robbery and oppressions of the people. Nothing effective is intended to be done and nothing effective will be done.

The present relations of the Administration and its lieutenants with the trust magnates and mcnopolists is so completely demonstrated by the following quotation from the Prophet Isaiah that I will quote it in a moment. Before the election, in their pretended determination to destroy the trusts, they and the trust magnates assumed all the vicious characteristics of the most ferocious animals in their purpose each to destroy the other, but after the election Isaiah describes them in the following language:

The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them.

And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together; and the lion shall eat straw like the ox.

[Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, this picture expresses in prophetic language the hypocrisy and duplicity of the Republican party; and when the American people learn how completely they have been bunkoed, the party that has always been the friend of the people, the champion of constitutional government, and the enemy of monopoly will be restored to power, and the principles of Jefferson and Jackson will once more come to bless a patient and outraged people. [Loud applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Nineteen minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to furnish at this time for the RECORD a few facts that ought to go to the country along with the speech of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE], and which I think apply to the situation more pertinently than Isaiah's prophecies, from which he has read.

In the last session of this Congress, running seven months, we had, in all, 56 roll calls. In the present legislative day, commencing February 26 and ending March 3, we have had now 66 roll calls. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There are upon the Speaker's table 47 measures, House bills with Senate amendments, vainly waiting for action. One of those is to mark the graves of the Confederates who died in the North or who had been buried in cemeteries of the nation. That is a bill which should be near to the hearts of these gentlemen from the South. That lies upon the Speaker's table.

Talk about patriotism! I want to give you just a few actual facts, gentlemen, in order that it may be seen what you are doing——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee rose.

Mr. LACEY. I can not yield to obstructionists on the other side.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee attempted to make himself heard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is out of order.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, we are within——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa will pause until order is restored.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LACEY. I can not yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa declines to yield.

Mr. LACEY. We are within twenty hours of the final falling of the Speaker's gavel. There are forty-seven bills upon the Speaker's table, all awaiting action, and they concern one side of the House as well as the other. At the north end of the Capitol nothing can be done except by unanimous consent. At this end of the Capitol nothing can be done by unanimous consent; obstructionists are running riot. And so, with twenty hours of this Congress remaining, with this amount of business pressing for action, priceless hours are wasted by demands for wholly unnecessary roll calls.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES]. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, on last Saturday I addressed the House a few moments upon the subject of the sale of the relics that have so long remained as ornaments and delightful reminders in the White House. In that speech my purpose was to call to the attention of the House and country the fact that the relics, or at least some of them, had been sold, and I referred to the fact that certain relics which had been given to General Jackson when President of the United States by Gen. Robert Patterson, of Philadelphia; also certain mirrors, with the faces of distinguished American patriots carved upon the frame; also a certain sideboard given by certain ladies to Mrs. Hayes when lady of the White House, and accepted by Mr. Hayes, then President, all of which had remained with others in the White House until a few days ago, when they were sold—sold, if you please, at an auction house as junk!

My purpose in calling this matter to your attention was in the hope that Congress would immediately take such steps as were necessary to restore these relics to the White House, or cause them to be placed in the Smithsonian Institution or some other equally noted and respected place.

There can be no question but that some of the relics were sold; we know of these three. It is not denied that others were sold. We do not know what relics were sold, nor how many. That they were sold at all is a most shocking thing for Congress and Americans to realize. They should not have been sold at all. If there was no room in the White House for them, they could easily have been placed in public buildings selected by proper authority.

I also adverted to the horrible spirit that would prompt any man, as an individual or as an officer of the American Government, to sell these relics, and I denounced then, as I do now, that spirit that would thus act.

But I must be brief. I do not—you do not—know what relics were sold. If any were sold, we must presume that many or all of them were sold, and my purpose is to find out what were sold. But the Republicans of the House, over the opposition of the Democrats, as a unit voted against and tabled my resolution calling on Colonel Bingham, "the officer in charge" under the law, to make a report and show what had and what had not been sold of these relics.

In the course of the debate it was denied by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]—I mean in substance denied—that the sideboard given to Mrs. Hayes and accepted by President Hayes while they were occupants of the White House, had been given Mrs. Hayes or that it had been sold.

I desire now to read from the Cincinnati Enquirer, to which I alluded in my speech, by quoting a telegram from John R. McLean, the owner and editor, I believe, of the Cincinnati Enquirer, in which Mr. McLean states, in substance, that it is a fact that the sideboard given Mrs. Hayes is now owned by the proprietor of a Washington brewery, located in the city of Washington, D. C., Joseph M. Frank being the proprietor.

The Enquirer of the 27th ultimo contains an article printed in that paper November 9, 1877, giving a full history of this sideboard, clearly showing from such article that the sideboard now owned by Mr. Frank and purchased by him at this auction sale was the identical sideboard which had been given to Mrs. Hayes and which has been, and remained until sold, in the White House.

A picture was taken of this sideboard, that is now in the Washington brewery, very recently by the Cincinnati Enquirer, and by that enterprising paper published on the 27th ultimo. That picture shows, says the Enquirer, that it is the same sideboard given to Mrs. Hayes some time about 1877, because it compares exactly with the picture taken of this sideboard by Mr. Frye, who made it and who took a picture of it as it stood in the White House.

I will read now the particular words in the Enquirer on that point, which says:

The accompanying reproduction (that is, the picture recently taken) of the sideboard doing saloon duty shows the identical decorations, establishing conclusively that it is none other than the Hayes sideboard, which, by reason of the exceptionally tedious work done on it, cost a small fortune.

I will now read from the Enquirer of the 27th ultimo, as follows:

SIDEBOARD MADE FOR WATER BOTTLES, BUT WHICH HAS PASSED TO WASHINGTON SALOONKEEPER, CONSTRUCTED IN THIS CITY FOR MRS. PRESIDENT HAYES—MAGNIFICENT PIECE OF FURNITURE WAS CREATION OF LATE HENRY FRY—"CLIPPING" TELLS STORY.

The passing from the Presidential mansion to the barroom of a Washington resort of the magnificent sideboard which adorned the dining room of the White House during the time when Mrs. Lucy Webb Hayes was mistress there recently raised a storm of indignation among Woman's Christian Temperance Union members throughout the country, especially in Ohio, where the life work of Mrs. Hayes crystallized about the cause of temperance.

So caustic became criticism that Col. Theodore Bingham, Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds at the national capital, instituted an investigation to ascertain if the sideboard sold as related was really the so-called Hayes sideboard. A dispatch to The Enquirer from Washington printed yesterday says in substance that Colonel Bingham has been unable to obtain any substantial evidence that any such sideboard as the one sold to the saloon man ever graced the White House dining room during Mrs. Hayes's time, much less having been presented to her.

INCONTROVERTIBLE EVIDENCE.

That the Colonel's field of investigation was limited is made apparent by incontrovertible evidence found in this city. This is in the form of a clipping from the files of the Enquirer of November 9, 1877, as follows:

"SUPERB SIDEBOARD—ARTISTIC WORK BY AN OHIO MAN TO ADORN THE EXECUTIVE MANSION AT WASHINGTON.

"The second piece of beautiful and artistic furniture of the two ordered from Mr. Fry for the dining room of the White House is now completed.

"It is not long since the dining table at which in the future will be seated all that Washington holds of the bravest and fairest of our own and other lands was sent to take place in the Presidential mansion.

"The sideboard, just finished, is a fit companion piece for the table, both as regards its dimensions and workmanship.

"It is made of solid mahogany, that when only polished and oiled retains all the richness of color that makes that wood so beautiful and valuable. It is divided in two unequal portions, the lower being of lesser height than the decorative piece above, yet the dimensions are so admirably proportioned throughout that there is to the entire piece an air of grace as well as massiveness. The lower portion is composed of a row of panels that open into deep compartments. On the center panel is carved the national bird perched in well-satisfied repose; he there represents the satisfaction hospitality brings. On each side of this center panel are a number of others that are carved in floral designs, and those are surrounded by a well-chosen conventional border. The subjects of these panels have been well chosen; the flowers that bloom in all their beauty in this State are beautifully represented, the honeysuckle, convolvulus, rose, lily, oleander, and others.

"On the top piece above these opening panels, imbedded in mahogany, are pieces of ebony whereon are carved in intaglio the coat of arms of the United States. To Uncle Sam alone is to belong this generous and handsome sideboard. The decorative centerpiece is an immense mirror, whose greater dimension is horizontal.

"On each side and disposed very gracefully are the side pieces, quadrangular in shape, and which give for each of three displayed carved panels, one of which, of course, opens. Around the top is a well-executed stamped border of ivy.

"On a similar sideboard the difference in height of the two portions would be too great, but on this immense piece it shows the workmanship to good advantage.

"Some idea of the appearance of this sideboard may be gathered from a statement of the dimensions. It is 9 feet 3 inches in height; from the base to the decorative top it is but 3 feet 10 inches, which leaves 5 feet 5 inches as the height of the graceful centerpiece. At the base it is 8 feet by 6.

"This sideboard, like the table, is the work of Mr. Fry and the younger members of his family, and again it is a source of pride to Cincinnati that a piece of work so meritorious should be ordered from this city, and so successfully."

A NOTED WOOD CARVER.

The Mr. Fry referred to in the above article, printed over a quarter of a century ago, was the late Mr. Henry Fry, who ranked among the finest wood carvers this or any other country has ever produced. It was he who, on order from the White House, designed and executed to a great degree the magnificent piece of furniture now doing duty as a saloon ornament.

Mr. William Fry, now a teacher at the Cincinnati Art Museum, remembers well the work of his father on not only the sideboard, but its companion piece above referred to. A stereopticon photo of the White House dining room with the sideboard and table in place, and which is now in possession of Mr. William Fry, shows in every detail the work described when the handsome piece left the hands of its maker.

Then follow the words which I first read.

It is clear to my mind that the sideboard sold and now in the possession of Mr. Frank is the identical sideboard alluded to by the Enquirer of November 7, 1877.

Now, gentlemen, if Colonel Bingham would sell this kind of a relic, what other relics would he sell? What other relics did he sell? Where are they? Who bought them? Should not Congress at once purchase and restore them as property of the United States?

But I have other additional authority showing that this sideboard was sold. I read now from one of the Washington papers, the Washington Mirror, and I may add that I have seen in substance the same statement in other papers of much larger circulation than this paper. The Mirror of February 14 thus reads:

There is another interesting bit of gossip in connection with the White House. President and Mrs. Roosevelt will be the last occupants who can order a wholesale change in the historic home of Executives. The episode about the Hayes's sideboard has caused certain Senators and Representatives to dive into the records of the past and revive an ancient law, to the effect that nothing may be changed in the exterior or interior of the White House and no furniture belongings sold, unless so ordered by a joint committee of the Senate and the House. In other words, when the President feels that he would like to throw out every object of historic value and allow only those things identified with his own Administration to remain, he will have to inform Congress of this wish and everything which he wishes sold will be submitted to a board of examination.

If this board decides adversely, the President will have to possess his soul in patience, until the time comes when he will not be compelled to act as Congress dictates. Should this law have been unearthed last winter, the White House would be richer in treasures than it is to-day. No reasonable committee would have sanctioned the vandalism which marked the restoration to colonial designs. This word "colonial" is repeated advisedly. The main vestibule is pure classic including the Ionic pillars and Sarcophagi. The East Room is a feeble reproduction of the Throne Room in the Bourbon Palace at Compiegne, and the State Dining Hall is copied from the Chapter Room, by Sir Christopher Wrenn, at Westminster Abbey.

Only Mr. McKim knows where he found the model for the Blue Room. Perhaps it originated in a bad dream; but certainly nothing like it can be located in the acknowledged models of colonial style. Yet, we are seriously told that it is a colonial restoration. Are the pigeon boxes colonial—and the east entrance which all visitors to the city mistake for a subway station, is this also a reproduction of the homes of the early fathers? Well, perhaps Mr. McKim will get an opportunity to answer all these queries, if the signs of the times prove trustworthy.

Suppose a committee of the House and the Senate should order to be torn from the state dining room the moose head, the deer head, the elk head, the bear head—heads of animals which I understand the President killed, and which now adorn the walls of the White House? Do you suppose the distinguished gentleman would submit to such an order?

Instead of these heads of animals adorning the White House, there should, it seems to me, be hanging the pictures of distinguished Presidents of the White House and the various ladies of the White House, that now hang about the cellar, we are informed.

Think of these heads being stuck up on the walls within the dignified and historic White House, showing the marksmanship of the distinguished President, and the pictures of Dolly Madison, Mrs. Harrison, or, if you please, the present lady of the White House—if such is the case—hanging on the walls of the tunnel through which visitors enter at the rear of the White House.

And here I digress, although I would like to say more, to state that I am informed that the paper recently placed on the walls of the White House is peeling off, that the veneering is cracking—blistering, as it were—coming off and exposing what? pine wood instead of oak wood, required by the contract. An oak-wood price was paid for it, I am told, and now we find pine wood substituted with veneer that is cracking, and I am informed by Philadelphia and New York papers you can place your finger in these cracks.

Gentlemen, what else could we expect? This work was done in about ninety days. The act providing for the improvement of the White House passed about the 28th of June, 1902, and the President moved into the White House, and, I believe, gave a reception, on or about October 22, and all this painting, decorating, etc., was done between these two dates.

Could we expect more? Could we expect a first-class job? Yet we have paid something over $600,000 for the work, and the architect, Mr. McKim, was paid, we are informed, a commission of 5 per cent for his work. These facts I think you should know, and the country should know, that we may, at least in the future, avoid such visitations upon the public, if not the President of the White House.

All these acts are wrong, and I denounce them as such. I appeal to you and I appeal to the country to condemn them. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield nine minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, within the last few minutes the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] has again reiterated the charge that this House has unseated a member without a quorum. I do not think that charge ought to stand without a refutation upon the RECORD.

Mr. VANDIVER. Do you deny the fact?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. OLMSTED. I therefore desire to make this statement: One hundred and seventy-seven members, constituting a quorum, must be present, but need not all vote, to make proceedings regular. The previous question having been ordered, upon the motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, to recommit the resolutions unseating Butler and seating Wagoner, the point of no quorum was made, the doors closed, and absent members brought in. The roll call showed 146 Republicans voting "yea," 12 Democrats voting "nay," and 17 members paired, answering "present."

The Speaker pro tempore noted present also Mr. BANKHEAD. Speaker HENDERSON was present, though not in the chair. This makes a total of 179, two more than a quorum. So the previous question was ordered. The question recurring upon the motion to recommit, a division (rising vote) was demanded. The "ayes" (Democrats) were 5, "noes" (Republicans) 165. Those paired, of course, did not rise, but were present, as were some Democrats who remained seated. It will be noted that 15 Republicans had come in since the quorum was ascertained. Mr. UNDERWOOD made the point of no quorum, which the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DALZELL, overruled as dilatory.

This occurred again upon the passage of the respective resolutions unseating Butler and seating Wagoner. Within twenty minutes after the roll call, showing more than a quorum present, a recess was taken until the next morning. The rising vote upon the motion to take the recess showed 173 yeas and 4 nays, a full quorum actually voting, and not including the Speaker, the Democrats who remained seated, nor the Republicans who, being paired, did not rise.

When the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DALZELL, overruled the point of no quorum as dilatory, the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. RICHARDSON, who had so far disbanded his army that he had not enough remaining to demand the yeas and nays, exclaimed: "No occupant of the chair ever before did that. It is unjust and unfair." But the RECORD of March 7, 1898, discloses that he was present and heard Speaker Reed three times in that one day, and each time after a division upon which less than a quorum voted, overrule the point of no quorum as dilatory, and once refuse a demand for tellers upon a call for the yeas and nays for the same reason.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I would like to interrupt to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLMSTED. Not now.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I simply want to know what the gentleman is reading from.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. OLMSTED. At least as late as January 25, 1896, he made a similar ruling. On June 5, 1896, in the contested-election case of Martin v. Lockhart, at a stage of the proceedings almost identical, the point of no quorum was overruled by a gentleman so fair as the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], and in Committee of the Whole, on March 25, 1898, that experienced parliamentarian, Mr. SHERMAN, of New York, made a similar ruling. It appears, therefore, that there was nothing novel nor surprising in the ruling made by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. DALZELL], and it is plainly evident that there were at least 15 more than a quorum present when the action was taken.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I ask the gentleman what he was reading from?

Mr. OLMSTED. I was reading the best I could from my own handwriting. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, then, it is not a copy of any record of this House.

Mr. OLMSTED. I am tired also of hearing the statement made that the committee did not carefully consider the evidence in that case. At least four members of the five who signed the report read every page of it, and all of it was considered carefully except the testimony of witnesses upon the point of Mr. WAGONER'S nomination, which point was waived by Mr. Butler's counsel.

We heard between ten and twelve hours' oral argument. Mr. Speaker, I regret that there was not more time for consideration and more time for discussion, but it must be remembered that that was the second time the Butler case came before this House at this Congress. Once it was brought up, on June 28, 1902, by Committee on Elections No. 1, of which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLER] is chairman, in a case in which he said upon this floor, "I desire here and now, measuring my words deliberately and carefully, to say that of all the other elections which have come to my attention, this was the boldest, the most impudent, and most outrageous election I ever heard of." Mr. Butler was unseated by this House upon that day. That was the first case. Now, to fill the vacancy——

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman——

Mr. OLMSTED. I must decline.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. OLMSTED. Now, to fill the vacancy a special election was held November 4, 1902, and Mr. Butler was again returned as elected. Mr. WAGONER promptly presented his memorial here, and this House passed a resolution requiring the testimony to be taken by February 1 and that our committee should immediately proceed to the consideration of the case, hear arguments, and present it in time for the consideration of this House at this session.

We did the best we could. We presented it at the earliest day we could. We were prepared for and hoped to have ample time for deliberation upon this floor; but upon the other side, before we had even filed our report, we were met with the threat that if that case was decided there should be no further legislation at this session that could be prevented. Having made the report, and it having been printed in the RECORD and laid over one day, the minority caucused and resolved to filibuster to the end of the session if that case were taken up.

There was no partisan advantage to be gained by this Republican House in unseating one gentleman and seating another. It did it simply because it believed it to be right, and because it declined to swerve from the plain line of its duty at the dictation or threat of a partisan minority.

Now, I regret, Mr. Speaker, as I said, that there was not more time for discussion, but it was not our fault. Three hours of the day that might have been devoted to discussion of this case were consumed in preventing us from reaching it. After it was reached I tried by unanimous consent to obtain four hours, the time allowed by the Supreme Court of the United States for the consideration of the most important cases.

Gentlemen upon the other side objected. Then, knowing that we would be met with filibustering and delay until the end of the session, there was nothing for us to do but to demand the previous question at the end of two hours' argument, one hour on either side. Even in that we were far more liberal than gentlemen were upon the other side in the Fifty-third Congress, when in a case coming from this very city they unseated Mr. JOY after twenty minutes' argument on either side, allowing to that gentleman nine minutes in his own behalf.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for two minutes, all the time remaining.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to say that the bill called up by the gentleman from Minnesota has been very carefully prepared, carefully gone over by the Secretary of War, and all the amendments suggested by him have been adopted. The bill very stringently protects the interests of the Government, and I trust that every member of the House will vote for it.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon suspending the rules, taking the bill from the Speaker's table, and passing the same.

The question being taken, Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee demanded a division.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 215, nays 10, answered "present" 15, not voting 110; as follows:

PUBLIC GROUNDS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President; which was read, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith reports by the Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of War, Attorney-General, Postmaster-General, Secretary of the Navy, Secretary of the Interior, Secretary of Agriculture, and the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, in compliance with the following provision of the sundry civil bill approved June 28, 1902:

"The President is hereby requested to cause to be prepared and submitted to Congress at the commencement of its next session a statement showing what lots or parcels of land, other than public lands held for settlement under the public land laws, are owned by the United States and held by the several Executive Departments or other branches of the public service, the area of each, the purposes for which each is held or occupied, in what State, Territory, or country, and in or near what town or city each is located."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, February 28, 1903.

JEFFERSON MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. LATIMER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the Senate bill 7307.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose?

Mr. LATIMER. To suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill. Any amendments?

Mr. LATIMER. No amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 7307) to provide certain souvenir medallions for the benefit of the Thomas Jefferson Memorial Association of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of aiding in the erection at the city of Washington, District of Columbia, of an appropriate memorial to the author of the Declaration of Independence, Thomas Jefferson, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to have prepared in the United States mint at Philadelphia four dies for medallions of such design and size as may be designated by the Thomas Jefferson Memorial Association of the United States and approved by him; and he shall have made and struck from these dies such number of medallions out of silver or bronze, not to exceed 150,000, as may be requested by the said memorial association, the net proceeds from the sale of the said proposed medallions to be applied to the fund for the erection of the proposed memorial under the auspices of the said memorial association.

SEC. 2. That the material from which the said proposed medallions are to be made shall be furnished to the director of the United States mint at Philadelphia at the expense of the said Thomas Jefferson Memorial Association of the United States, a body corporate under the laws governing the District of Columbia.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I demand a second, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama demands a second. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to tell the House.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 3.

So a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DALZELL). The Chair will recognize the gentleman from South Carolina in favor of the bill and the gentleman from Alabama as opposed to the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Alabama is not opposed to the bill, and hence is not entitled to control the time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, my genial friend from Illinois is a mind reader. On every occasion that I have taken the floor he has risen to this point of order; but I desire to state to the gentleman that I intend to vote against this bill. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman recognizes the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. LATIMER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be taken up and considered as passed without a vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I must demand the regular order.

Mr. LATIMER. I do not think it necessary for any statement to be made to the members of this House.

Mr. TAWNEY. Not at all.

Mr. LATIMER. In order to get every vote for a proposition of this kind I think it is only necessary to state in a brief way the object of this bill. [Cries of "Vote!"] Similar bills to this have passed the House frequently in the past; and in the early part of this session a similar bill to this was passed, providing for souvenir medallions in order to aid in building a monument to Washington in Alexandria. The object of this bill is simply to give the Jefferson Memorial Committee, without any cost to the Government, and under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury, this form of a souvenir medallion that is to be arranged, and it will cost the Government nothing to strike them off, because the Association proposes to furnish the material out of which they are made.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. LATIMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. As I understand, it is claimed on your side of the House that Thomas Jefferson was the father of Democracy, is it not?

Mr. LATIMER. I am willing to recognize him as such.

Mr. PAYNE. He might not be willing to return the compliment if he was living. [Laughter.] I was going to ask you this further question: If there is not money enough, generosity enough, patriotism enough, and filial love enough to make these people, claiming to be in symyathy with the principles of Jefferson, by voluntary subscription or otherwise, raise a fund for the purpose of erecting a monument to so great a man as Jefferson was, without going into a sort of gift enterprise to raise a fund?

Mr. LATIMER. Mr. Speaker, I can say this to the gentleman from New York, that we are not asking him to contribute one dollar toward this memorial. The Democrats of the country will willingly undertake this enterprise, with such patriotic Republicans as love the memory of Thomas Jefferson. The object of this, as I have said, is simply to give this association an opportunity to raise some money for this great patriotic purpose, and I am willing with that statement to leave it to the House of Representatives. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD].

Mr. LATIMER. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has sixteen minutes remaining.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to this bill not because of any demerit or defect in the proposed legislation of which I have any knowledge. My objection is that under the peculiar circumstances that surround us to-day we have not had that proper opportunity to investigate it that we ought to have had. There is no reason, Mr. Speaker, why all the legislation of the session should have been put in pigeonholes and held until the last six days of the session. It is done for what purpose? Simply to gag those who oppose the policies of the dominant party.

A trust bill, for instance, has been brought here under the rule, which compels us to vote upon it as it is presented by the majority. We are compelled to vote for the bill precisely as it is presented by the other party, without an opportunity to discuss it or to offer to amend it.

When you get hold of something that is of no particular importance; when, for instance, you take up the Fowler bill, which you never expected to pass, you give unlimited time for debate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my opposition comes to-day because of the procedure in this House that denies to representatives of the people a fair opportunity to know what they are doing. Gentlemen on the other side have made the point that we are frittering away the valuable time of this House in its closing days, when we ought to be devoting our attention to the passage of the great bills that must succor and support the Government. Yet, Mr. Speaker, we find the majority on this floor turning aside from these great appropriation bills to wreak their vengeance on the people who dare vote the Democratic ticket.

Why? When only six more days remain, when only six days until the gavel shall fall and this Congress shall go out of existence, even with all these great appropriation bills pending, the animus of the Republicans has been such that they have turned aside from the consideration of these appropriation bills to show their feelings and their animosities and their resentments against our State and our people by taking away from a member of this House the right to a seat upon this floor for six paltry days that yet remain. What great reason calls upon you, as statesmen, to turn aside from the important business which you say so much about, to consider this contested election case? Hurried up, you sent the contestee back to his district to take testimony, and he comes here with twenty-three hundred pages of testimony that you compelled him to take in a very short time, an unprecedentedly short time, and then you refuse to read it.

I have heard it argued here by some gentlemen that that man ought to have been deprived of his seat on general principles; that they had read enough of the evidence to know that he ought to have been deprived of his seat. I heard an intimation a moment ago from the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER] that the policemen had contributed to the campaign fund that brought about the result of which you complain. That is unqualifiedly false. The policemen of St. Louis did make a contribution to the State committee. Those funds were not contributed to the campaign of Mr. Butler.

Mr. Speaker, you have taken from a member elected by the people his seat. You have seated one to represent the people whom they refused to elect. How have you reached that result? You have done it by forcing this election case here, not as an assault upon Mr. Butler, but an assault upon the sovereign State which I in part represent. Why did you turn him out, and why did you seat the other gentlemen?

Gentlemen of the Election Committee say that fraud was so rampant in that district that they were obliged to disqualify 12,000 sovereign voters of Missouri in order to reach this man and take away from him the six remaining days of his term. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] say that a patriotic motive moved him when he turned aside in these last closing hours of the session, from the important business of the House, to take away from this man his right to sit here. Fraud! What fraud? The man whom you have seated here, Mr. Speaker, was not nominated by the party which you represent. He could not be nominated by your party in that district. How did he get here?

Mr. VANDIVER. He was nominated by fraud.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. He was not nominated. Under the laws of Missouri, when a proper number of electors demand to present the name of any person to be voted for as Congressman, they may sign a petition to that effect, and when the requisite number of signatures has been obtained, that man goes upon the ticket as the nominee of those electors. We grant you that, if by some sort of forgery, a man's name should be placed on the ticket, without a single petitioner in his behalf, and he should receive a majority of votes, he could hold his seat. But who will say that in such a case the election was not the result of fraud—base fraud.

How did Mr. WAGONER get upon this ticket? He got upon it by petition; and the signatures to that petition were in large part forged; the men whose names were placed upon that petition were not for him as a nominee for Congress; they never put their names to that petition. The petition was gotten up by forging the signatures of the persons whose names were upon it. Mr. WAGONER'S name went upon the ballot and he was voted for by as rank forgery as ever was perpetrated by any thief who ever marauded a bank on a forged check. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania deny that?

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. OLMSTED. I ask the gentleman whether the name of Mr. WAGONER was not put on the Australian ballot by the Democratic board of election commissioners of St. Louis?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It was. The petition came there with a sufficient number of names; and the election commissioners, intending to do that which was fair and honest—not knowing that the petition was rank forgery—put his name on that ballot. And I want to call attention to some of the testimony.

Mr. OLMSTED. I want to ask whether the gentleman from Missouri knows——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I will answer the gentleman's other question first, and then I will yield to him again.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I want to answer the first question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I say that if Mr. WAGONER'S name was on that ballot by fraud and forgery, he might have been elected, and might hold his seat. But I also say that if honest votes were cast for Mr. Butler, it was the duty of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as a representative of the people, as an honest man, to ascertain what valid votes were cast for him, and credit him with them and cast out the invalid ones, if any there were, and abide by the result. And if that could not be done within the six days remaining of this session, every intendment ought to have been allowed in favor of the certificate of election; and a man's seat should not be taken from him except upon a fair and honest showing. I say it was the gentleman's duty as an honest representative and an honest man to so treat that case.

I concede that WAGONER'S name was upon that ballot, entitled to be voted for, but it got there by forgery—rank forgery. Not only that, but some of the names upon whose petition Mr. WAGONER was placed on that ballot affixed their signatures to it, as the testimony shows, when they were languishing in durance vile, in the common jail of the city of St. Louis. Yet, my Republican brethren, this was the case that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has told you was so reeking with fraud that he must stop all the appropriation bills and important legislation to turn this man out for the six remaining days of his term.

Mr. OLMSTED. May I ask one other question?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I want this testimony. Mr. Joseph E. Cross was asked this question:

Did you sign the petition for the candidacy of George C. R. Wagoner for Congress?

He answered "No, sir."

Also Mr. Taaffe:

Did you sign a petition for the candidacy of George C. R. Wagoner?
I have no recollection of ever having signed such a paper.

Abe Gallant:
Q. Did you sign any petition for the candidacy of George Wagoner for Congress?
A. No, sir.
E. H. Burkhart:
Q. Did you sign a petition for the candidacy of George C. R. Wagoner for Congress?
A. No, sir.
William Burk:
Q. Did you sign a petition for George C. R. Wagoner for Congress?
A. No, sir.
Joseph Friel:
Q. Did you sign a petition for George C. R. Wagoner for Congress?
A. No.

And so on, Mr. Speaker, name after name, name after name, name after name, forgery after forgery, and yet you put Butler out, not because the evidence showed that he ought to go out, but because you say there was so much uncleanness there that in your immaculate purity you wanted somebody to sit with you who was your equal and worthy to associate with you. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

You turn out a Democrat simply because he is a Democrat and a Democrat who has at his back a majority of 6,000 honest Missouri voters. You turn him out of this little, pitiful remnant of six days, performing, as you say, your "patriotic" duty, that the people of his district may be properly represented! Mr. Speaker, the annals of the American Congress show no parallel of such prejudice and unfairness.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Oh, let the gentleman go down and answer to the people of that district whom he has designated jailbirds and bawds.

Mr. MILLER. Does the gentleman decline to answer?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Yes; I decline to yield to you. This is this case in a nutshell: What have we done in retaliation? Nothing. We have simply asked you to pass legislation according to the Constitution, and we are called filibusters. Yet when we meet you in the campaign and charge you with sixty days of filibustering in order to nullify the declarations of your own platform and deny to the people of the Western Territories the statehood you promised them, you will justify that sort of filibustering.

We are not filibustering. We are demanding that business here shall be transacted according to the rules of this House and the Constitution of the United States. Is that filibustering?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, in the early days of the settlement of the section of Ohio where I live the Methodist Episcopal Church came first to the occupation of the ground and established a circuit in that neighborhood with some eight or ten appointments. On one occasion, at the close of the Ohio conference, there came a young preacher assigned to duty on that conference. Speaking in the largest town, where he was located for his home, he made the acquaintance of an old class leader, a prominent member of the church. This old gentleman listened to the first sermon of the young preacher. The text was "And Peter's wife's mother lay sick of a fever." The old gentleman listened to the sermon with a great deal of interest, but——

Several MEMBERS on Democratic side. Oh, that is old.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; that is old; but I will show you how well it fits. It is not much older than your grievances. He went from post to post and appointment to appointment to listen to the young man and see whether he would fill the bill. On every occasion the young man gave out the same text: "And Peter's wife's mother lay sick of a fever." At the last place in the circuit the old gentleman had suggested to him that he would like to hear something brilliant and fine, something apropos of the present situation. He therefore listened with great interest to hear what the text was going to be. The young man gave it out: "And Peter's wife's mother lay sick of a fever." The old man put his head down to that of a brother who was sitting next to him and said: "Oh, Lord! hasn't that old woman died yet?" [Laughter.] Now, it seems to me that that old woman who was disposed of here some days ago ought to be dead.

Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, we passed a bill to prevent the putting of trade-marks upon plugs of tobacco and putting little coupons inside of smoking and cut and dried tobacco packages. We did so because we were afraid that the practice would lead up to immorality. To-day we are proposing to pass a bill based distinctly upon the idea of a gambling performance in order that a monument may be built to a man who is dead. There is no feature against which the Otjen bill inveighs, nor is there one in the whole line of prize performances, that is the equal in point of nonmerit, from the moral standpoint, of this bill that the American Congress is engaged in considering this afternoon, a bill to build a monument to a man who died nearly one hundred years ago.

Mr. PAYNE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Does not the gentleman think that since Jefferson has been dead almost one hundred years, and a great party has been claiming his name and has failed so far to build a monument to his memory, that we ought to do a little something for those people?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think we ought to, but I think the men who cry out that he is their patron saint ought to build a monument. I think the man who drafted the Kentucky resolutions of 1798, and laid the foundation of the superstructure that caused the shedding of the blood of more than 200,000 American citizens, had better have the monument built by the men who admire his career.

Mr. BURLESON. We will do it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would not engage in this sort of a nickel-in-the-slot performance, to build a monument to George Washington; and I think it is a most pitiful performance for the Democratic party of the United States to come here, after these roll calls, and demand that the American people shall take the machinery of their Government, their mints and their Treasury, and go into the business of building a monument. Where will you stop if you open the door to this performance? I am opposed to the bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LATIMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, having but a moment, I must proceed in media res, and I want to suggest to my venerable friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] who has just taken his seat, that if he would follow the precepts of Thomas Jefferson, whom he denounces, and the great statesmen of that era, he would be much more valuable to his country than his career has demonstrated him to be. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We are becoming cooler since this contest began in the closing days of this session, and I am not here to appeal to the prejudice of any gentlemen in this House. I believe it may be said that never on any occasion have I felt it necessary to make a single partisan utterance in this House, nor have I on the hustings in discussing any public issue. Believing in the principles of Jefferson the Democratic party and its representatives have been ever able to defend them without appealing to the prejudice of section, men, or parties.

This House is proceeding to-day, and it has been from the beginning of this session, in violation of those principles of equality and justice which Jefferson taught, and all just and true men believe in. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] saw fit to refer to the fact on yesterday that by objecting to unanimous-consent proceedings in this House more than 250 bills had been sidetracked. He referred, I presume, to objections that had been made by myself up to the last few days; for I have been objecting, and fair notice of those objections were given on the 26th of June last, and the reasons therefor, and again on January 13, in this House.

Let us look at this question of legislation by unanimous consent for a moment and see if, as sensible legislators, we ought to proceed in that way.

Mr. MANN. I rise to a point of order. I should like to know whether the gentleman is speaking for or against the proposition.

Mr. MOON. If the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MANN. I do not object, because I am willing that the gentleman shall have the benefit of unanimous consent.

Mr. MOON. I do not desire the benefit of unanimous consent. I am speaking to the question that we have all been discussing during the whole of this legislative day since last Thursday. And in reply to the gentleman from Iowa I desire to say that I approve of the defeat of these bills sought to be passed by unanimous consent. I approve of the withholding of unanimous consent, because of the inability of this House intelligently to consider a bill under that process. You are aware, Mr. Speaker, that under the rules as they exist to-day the Speaker gives opportunity first to one and then to another of his friends, and that we come in here and none object, because we fear somebody will object to our bill, and the most pernicious legislation is passed in that way.

Mr. LACEY. I will ask the gentleman a question in this connection.

Mr. MOON. What is the gentleman's inquiry?

Mr. LACEY. I should like to ask a question here.

Mr. MOON. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. Does not the gentleman think a bill, where there was a mere clerical error in the numbering of a certain section, was a very proper matter to be corrected by unanimous consent instead of requiring two roll calls?

Mr. MOON. Certainly; that is very just. There was no objection to that. My objection went to bills on the Calendar sought to be passed by unanimous consent. No, gentlemen, it is improper for you to invoke legislation by the unanimous-consent proposition. You do wrong to yourselves by this method of considering bills. You do injustice to your country by imposing upon it unjust legislation in this way. If this House can not consider in an orderly and decent way a measure upon the Calendar, it is due to the existence of the code of rules under which you are operating.

Have you not seen in the last six days that if you proceed under the rules—in direct conformity and observance of the rules—that it is utterly impossible for you to pass any legislation expeditiously and wisely in this House? What have you considered? There has been no debate; there has been no consideration; there has been no deliberation, and yet the rules are being rigidly enforced. In a wild flurry you have passed measures that you shall regret. The proceedings of the last six days have demonstrated very clearly the utter impotency of the rules of this House, the utter inability of this House to transact business properly under the rules.

You must give the power to the Speaker, abdicate your positions as Representatives on this floor, destroy those privileges which you have as members, and sit here to register the decree of the gentleman that you put in the Speaker's chair if you do anything under the rules. There is no deliberation; there is no legislation; there is no just and honest representation of the people in such methods. Measures should be put on the Calendar that they may be heard. You should obtain permission of this House alone for a hearing and just consideration of these bills. You must not leave to the Speaker the power of a dictator and vest in the Committee on Rules the duties of a privy council to the dictator. We had as well adjourn and let these gentlemen register their will, and adopt it.

See where you have placed legislation in the last six days, This object lesson has been given to you for the country's good. I believe in the majority controlling: I believe in drastic rules; but I believe they ought to be just. You have, in order to enact legislation at all, been forced to make a rule by which if a gentleman registers his vote in the affirmative it means the action that that vote intends to imply; but if he votes in the negative, you have given a construction previously to that vote and say that it shall mean just what an affirmative vote means and what the voter did not mean, and even more—the passage of a bill without a moment of consideration. How tyrannical! how foolish! how unmanly such conduct!

I have no desire to refer to the partisan contest that has just passed. It has demonstrated a very ugly partisanship in this House and on this floor. I would not say that the distinguished gentleman [Mr. DALZELL] who now occupies the chair and who made a ruling which I regard as unconstitutional and unjust was a dishonest man, for I believe that he is an honest and patriotic man; but under the pressure of such circumstances, in the absence of a quorum, as shown by the RECORD itself, that gentleman of character and standing, by partisan feeling and partisan rancor and the dominance of an unwise majority, has been forced to violate the Constitution of his country, and you have indorsed it.

You say, however, that you found a justification in something that a Democratic Congress had heretofore done with reference to the same contested district. Maybe the Democrats have done wrong as well as you have on many occasions, but you can not justify a wrong by your majority because a Democratic majority did wrong in this House. The reply is unworthy of the manhood of the Republican party. If ruin and disaster ever befall this country, it will be by reason of the fact that the constitutional rights and liberties of our people on this floor in and out of this House are trampled under foot by the outrages of a partisan majority. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON. I should like to have about a minute more.

Mr. LATIMER. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, of course I can not discuss this question in a moment, but now, in reference to the complaint of our friends that we are persisting here in a course of obstruction, I desire to say that the unanimous-consent proposition is the obstructive proposition; it is violative of the regular order of the proceedings of this House, and it ought not at any time to be tolerated.

A roll call is not obstruction. That is guaranteed in the Constitution. I believe in the enactment of legislation in this House that no bill ought to be passed except upon a roll call, so that the constituency of these Representatives may know exactly where they stand upon public issues, and that they may not shelter themselves behind a mere rising vote. Can gentlemen on the other side complain of the enforcement of this constitutional provision?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LATIMER. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. LATIMER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I am so very sorry I can hardly express it, sorry for his sake that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] should have deserted that old familiar story of the young preacher and Peter's wife's mother and taken resource finally in a diatribe against a man the latches of whose shoes neither he nor I are worthy to so much as dream of untying. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am sorry, because I love that old anecdote. It is one of the first things I ever became acquainted with and has been constantly presented for my admiration since. It is late in the history of America when a man can stand upon the floor of the House of Representatives and declaim against the author of the Declaration of Independence, against the author of the first act of complete religious freedom that the world ever saw on a statute book. Declaim against him because somebody has asked that the mint of the United States do what this bill requires.

It is late in the day for a man to treat Thomas Jefferson in the attitude of a partisan. I can tell the gentleman that Thomas Jefferson has never had a monument erected to him at the expense of the Government, nor would he have wished it. It would not have been in keeping either with the simplicity or the individualism of his magnificent character. The most splendid monument that can be erected to him is standing now in the graveyard on his old plantation at Monticello, and upon it is inscribed by his own request "Thomas Jefferson born—Thomas Jefferson died—Author of the Declaration of Independence, of the statute of religious freedom for the State of Virginia, and Father of the University of Virginia." [Applause.]

He neglected to have inscribed there that his desire to disseminate information amongst the young who should grow up to mold the destinies of a republic in the future was such that he literally bankrupted himself. But history knows all those things.

Mr. Speaker, what is this bill? Here it is; it is very simple. It is to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to have prepared in the United States mint at Philadelphia—four dies for medallions of such design and size as may be designated by the Thomas Jefferson Memorial Association of the United States and approved by him; and he shall have made and struck from these dies such number of medallions out of silver or bronze, not to exceed 150,000, as may be requested by the said memorial association, the net proceeds from the sale of the said proposed medallions to be applied to the fund for the erection of the proposed memorial under the auspices of the said memorial association.

SEC. 2. That the material from which the said proposed medallions are to be made shall be furnished to the director of the United States mint at Philadelphia at the expense of the said Thomas Jefferson Memorial Association of the United States, a body corporate under the laws governing the District of Columbia.

You have been erecting every day monuments to all sorts of unheard-of obscurities, giving the site and donating the pedestal at public expense; and yet when we come in here and ask this, gentlemen rise, and because the Republican party in its latter days, when it has fallen upon evil times and among evil tongues to defend it, can not stand for what the fathers of the country stood for, can not stand for the man whom Abraham Lincoln, the founder of your own party, almost worshiped, we are met with a partisan diatribe and with the statement that "the Democratic party, if anybody, ought to erect his monument."

The Government will not erect this monument under this bill. These medallions will be sold; they will not cost the Government of the United States a dollar, because the Thomas Jefferson Memorial Association will furnish the material. It is the individualism of Thomas Jefferson that is speaking in this bill, and this monument will be erected, not by the Government, but by those who love him, and nobody except those who love him, whether Democrats or Republicans, will purchase a medallion or will contribute a cent of money. No great magnate will contribute it all. The people will contribute it in small sums.

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman from Ohio said that this was a gift enterprise. Will the gentleman tell us where it is?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It is nothing under the sun like it. When in the Forty-seventh Congress a bill like this was introduced with a view to erect a monument to George Washington, who stood up here and denounced him as a partisan or indulged in this sort of diatribe? There is nothing of a gift character or lottery about it. The bill is just what I have read, and there is a precedent for it, which I have cited.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. LATIMER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules, discharge the Committee of the Whole, and pass the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 188, nays 2, answered "present" 17, not voting 143; as follows:

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey with Mr. GOOCH.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa with Mr. FEELY.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. MERCER. I desire to present a conference report on House bill 7414, known as the public-buildings bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, is it necessary to reserve a point of order on this report at the present time, or should it be made after the reading of the report?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. At any time before the report is debated. The Clerk will read the report.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 7414) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 1, 3, 8, 9, 11, 13, 14, 15, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 29.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 4, 5, 6, 7, 10, 12, 16, 17, 23, 25, 26, 27, 28, 30, 31, 32, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 2, and agree to the Senate provision with an amendment as follows: After the word "dollars," in the last line of the amendment, insert the following: "and authority is hereby given to the Secretary of the Treasury to settle and adjust any claims for damages due to the abrogation of certain contracts under a former appropriation for a public building at Anniston, Ala.: Provided, The amount thereof can be liquidated for such sums as, in his opinion, are just and reasonable, and a sum of money sufficient to cover such adjustments and settlements shall be paid from the amount herein authorized;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the item "United States post-office at East Liverpool, Ohio, $30,000," insert the following: "Provided, That such site shall be deemed to comply with the provisions of this act if bounded on two sides by streets, and on a third side by a public alley and shall contain not less than 13,000 square feet;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert in line 2 of the amendment, after the word "directed," the words "in his discretion;" and the Senate agree to the same.

The following statement of the House conferees was read:

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 7414) an act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report on each of the House amendments, namely:

1. Increases limit of cost of public building at Jacksonville, Fla., from $328,881.38 to $528,881.38.

2. Increases limit of cost of public building at Georgetown, S. C., from $50,000 to $65,000. Also increases limit of cost of public building at Anniston, Ala., from $75,000 to $150,000, and regulates liquidated damages.

3. Increases limit of cost of public building at Chicago, Ill., from $4,000,000 to $4,750,000, a decrease of $40,000 from the House amendment.

8. Increases limit of cost of public building at Fargo, N. Dak., $80,000.

9. Increases limit of cost of public building at Elizabeth City, N. C., $20,000, instead of $15,000, as provided by the House.

11. Increases limit of cost of public building at Omaha, Nebr., $5,000.

13. Increases limit of cost of public building at Washington, Pa., $30,000, instead of $5,000, as provided by the House.

14. Increases limit of cost of public building at Nashville, Tenn., $160,000, instead of $60,000, as provided by the House.

15. Increases limit of cost of public building at Marblehead, Mass., from $40,000 to $70,000; also increases limit of cost of public building at Superior, Wis., from $225,000 to $300,000.

18. Allows an increase for public building at Amesbury, Mass., of $10,000 instead of $2,000, as provided by the House.

19. Limits cost of public building at Sterling, Ill., to $40,000 instead of $35,000, as provided by the House.

20. Limits cost of public building at Traverse City, Mich., to $50,000, instead of $40,000, as provided by the House.

21. Limits cost of public building at Pierre, S. Dak., to $170,000, instead of $100,000, as provided by the House.

22. Limits cost of public building at Yankton, S. Dak., to $80,000, instead of $50,000, as provided by the House.

29. Amends section 12 of Public Law 146 with reference to public building at Macon, Ga., increasing the limit of cost to $156,000.

DAVID H. MERCER,
CHARLES W. GILLET,
J. H. BANKHEAD,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MERCER was recognized.

Mr. CANNON. I should like to ask the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MERCER] a question.

Mr. MERCER. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand, the provisions for the hall of records and for the site south of the Post-Office Department building are retained in this bill?

Mr. MERCER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. In the language of the House?

Mr. MERCER. In the language of the House, with this change: Add to the provision with reference to the hall of records the words "in his discretion," referring to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CANNON. Does this bill as now reported appropriate money for these various buildings?

Mr. MERCER. No, sir; there is no appropriation in this bill.

Mr. CANNON. No appropriation for anything?

Mr. MERCER. Nothing.

Mr. CANNON. It will be necessary then, if this is to be available, that appropriations be made?

Mr. MERCER. Yes, sir. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was put.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, and others. Division!

Mr. MERCER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (having counted the members in favor of ordering the yeas and nays) said: There are 41 in the affirmative—in the opinion of the Chair, not a sufficient number.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I demand that the other side be counted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (having counted those voting in the negative). Ninety-seven noes. A sufficient number in the affirmative, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 205, nays 8, answered "present" 11, not voting 126; as follows:

POPULATION OF RESERVE CITIES.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 7659) to amend sections 5191 and 5192 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes, and move the adoption of the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut presents a conference report, which the Clerk will read, together with the statement of the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7659) to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to amend sections 5191 and 5192 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, and 4.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the word "thirty" inserted by said amendment insert the word "twenty-five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

CHARLES N. FOWLER,
E. J. HILL,
Managers on the part of the House.

W. B. ALLISON,
NELSON W. ALDRICH,
JAMES K. JONES,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees is as follows:

The committee of conference submits the following statement:

The law now provides that any city having a population of 50,000 can become a reserve city if three-fourths of the banks located therein make application to the Comptroller for that purpose. This bill reduces the requisite population to 25,000.

CHARLES N. FOWLER.
E. J. HILL.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, in explanation of the bill, I will state, in the first place, that it has the unanimous support of the Committee on Banking and Currency, that it has been agreed to by the Senate, and is now here for final action. The law at present provides that a reserve city must be a city of not less than 50,000 population. The multiplication of small banks, under the $25,000 class of the act of March 4, 1900, in the smaller communities in the West and South made it necessary for their convenience that the grading of the reserve cities should be reduced below the population of 50,000 people. It is purely a matter of convenience for the more rural sections of the country.

This bill will have probably no effect along the Atlantic seaboard. The request came from the West and was concurred in fully by our Southern brethren. The whole effect of the bill, and it has absolutely no other effect, is simply to provide that cities of 25,000 population may be reserve cities, where the small banks could go to place their reserve. That is the effect of it. It involves nothing else whatever. I have asked the members of the committee if any of them desired to use the time, and they say "no." Therefore I shall take up another question, unless somebody desires to ask some questions in regard to the bill.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Connecticut what sized cities this will allow to have reserves.

Mr. HILL. Cities of 25,000 population. I will state that the Senate insisted on cities of 30,000 population. The Banking and Currency Committee first reported 15,000. A compromise was reached of 25,000 population.

Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will yield to me, I want to read a little article in a paper which I think may have some influence upon the passage of this bill, possibly. The item, Mr. Speaker, is from the Louisville Courier-Journal. It is entitled "The minority's mistake."

The filibustering course of the Democrats of the House is ill advised. It may have been well enough to filibuster to prevent the Republicans unseating Butler, but after Butler was unseated the continuance of the filibustering tactics is not justifiable. For the minority of the House to say that there shall be no legislation at all simply because a partisan injustice has been done them by the majority, or the rules of the House perverted in doing it, is neither dignified nor logical. The country has some rights above those of political parties, and among these are the rights to needed legislation. For any party to attempt to deny it this legislation merely out of pique or anger against partisan opponents is an indefensible attitude to take. The impression such action necessarily makes is little short of childish, and its effect is more to injure the party making it than the party against which it is directed.

This comes from a very prominent Democratic paper.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. What is the paper?

Mr. PAYNE. The Louisville Courier-Journal. [Loud, derisive cries on the Democratic side.] Possibly the gentleman has heard of the paper, and has heard of the Democracy and the great reputation of the editor of that paper.

Mr. VANDIVER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Why, certainly.

Mr. VANDIVER. Will you read in that connection an editorial from the Washington Post as well as the Louisville Courier-Journal? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. No; I do not care to read an editorial of the Washington Post. The Washington Post, according to the latest editorial, has never found out that this special election was held last November—November, 1902—does not seem to know anything about it.

Several MEMBERS on the Democratic side. That is the Star.

Mr. PAYNE. I might go further and say that the editor of that paper, it seems, did not know that in December we asked for a rule to allow this case to be heard, the evidence to be presented and reported to the House in time so that it could be heard before the 4th of March. It has forgotten, evidently, that the Democratic minority filibustered against that rule, evidently with the intention of preventing the opponent of Mr. Butler from coming in here with his evidence until after the 4th of March, under the general law in regard to contested-election cases.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman if he stands by the statement of the editorial from which he read from the Courier-Journal, stating that the minority have attempted to obstruct business and prevent legislation.

Mr. PAYNE. Do I stand upon the statement? Do I stand with this statement!

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Have we attempted to obstruct legislation?

Mr. PAYNE. Is there any man with common sense that does not know the truth of that statement? [Loud applause on the Republican side, and cries of "No!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Then I assume, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from New York, when he says that, when he assumes that, knows that we have done nothing of that kind and no man of common sense will make that charge. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. And I would have stated——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. We have asked you to legislate within your rules. [Applause on the Democratic side and jeers on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. I do not yield to the gentleman. I do not know why he continues to interrupt me. I might have gone a little further if I had written this editorial. I would have quoted the language of the editor of the Washington Post, perhaps, attributed to minority Senators, who said the action of the minority of the House here was not only childish, but assinine. [Great laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

That would have been my sentiment; and I would have stood for that statement, too. [Renewed applause on the Republican side.] But I was saying the Post did not know the facts in this case. They did not know that this report came in here, and this evidence, along about the 1st of February. They did not know that the Elections Committee took it up and studied the facts. They did not know the fact that the counsel for Mr. Butler admitted that there was nothing in the evidence justifying the position that Mr. WAGONER was not properly nominated.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That is untrue, absolutely untrue. [Loud cries of "Oh!" and great confusion on both sides of the House.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now take a recess until 10 o'clock this evening.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York moves that the House take a recess until 10 o'clock to-night.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I call for a division.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CLAYTON. Do business! Do business!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. A parliamentary inquiry, which is not dilatory, either.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order. The Chair is entitled to hear the gentleman's parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The question I wish to ask is this——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not hear the gentleman for the confusion in the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I wish to ask if anybody upon this side had any right to a division of the time that was consumed by the gentleman from New York?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Connecticut is in charge of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understand that. I think the Chair knows that when the gentleman does wish to talk to the bill, then the time is equally divided between the two sides.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no rule on that subject, the Chair will state. The gentleman in charge of the conference report controls the time. The gentleman from Connecticut, when he took the floor, offered to yield time to gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. HILL. Not only that, but prior to taking the floor I went to other members of the committee and asked them if they desired time.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, the previous question has not been called upon this motion. I rose, and I desire to be recognized.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon the motion to take a recess and the division has begun. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 143, nays 57, answered "present" 15, not voting 135, as follows:

So the motion to take a recess was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:
Until further notice:
Mr. SOUTHARD with Mr. GORDON.
Mr. BROMWELL with Mr. CASSINGHAM.
Mr. SHOWALTER with Mr. LATIMER.
Mr. SCHIRM with Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN.
Mr. SCOTT with Mr. BRUNDIDGE.
Mr. MANN with Mr. JETT.
Mr. FOSTER of Vermont with Mr. POU.
Mr. PATTERSON of Pennsylvania with Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama.
Until 11 o'clock p. m.:
Mr. THOMAS of Iowa with Mr. SLAYDEN.
On this vote:
Mr. HENRY of Connecticut with Mr. BROUSSARD.
Until 7.30 p. m.:
Mr. SMITH of Iowa with with Mr. STARK.
The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 10 o'clock p. m.

The recess having expired, the House (at 10 o'clock p. m.) resumed its session.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum present. By actual count there are less than 100 men on the floor.

Mr. PAYNE. I demand the yeas and nays on the pending question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands the yeas and nays on the pending question, which is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon ordering the yeas and nays, and a quorum is not required on that question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I submit to the Speaker a point of order, that there is no quorum present, and I submit that point to be acted upon by the Chair when I make it.

The SPEAKER. It does not require a quorum. It is not necessary to have a quorum to order the yeas and nays. The Chair has already made that ruling.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have counted the House, and there are less than 100 members present, and we have been in recess for three hours. I make the point of no quorum present.

Mr. PAYNE. Who appointed the gentleman to count the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. As many as favor agreeing to the conference report will, when their names are called, vote "aye," those opposed will vote "no," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 204, nays 18, answered "present" 11, not voting 117: as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced, as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 1488. An act for the relief of T. A. Woodress;

H. R. 15802. An act for the relief of certain homestead settlers in the State of Alabama;

H. R. 17026. An act granting a pension to Jerome W. Turner; and

H. R. 17085. An act to effectuate the provisions of the additional act of the international convention for the protection of industrial property.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 7414) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to author- the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bill of the following title in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

H. R. 11997. An act granting to the Hawaii Ditch Company, Limited, the right of way over public lands in the districts of North and South Kohala, in the island of Hawaii, for the purpose of constructing and maintaining ditches or canals and the necessary reservoirs, dams, and the like, for irrigation and domestic purposes in said districts.

CIVIL APPOINTMENTS OF PERSONS FROM MILITARY OR NAVAL SERVICE.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and discharge the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 13105) to amend section 1754 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the preference in civil appointments of persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service, and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio calls up the bill H. R. 14105, moves to suspend the rules, and discharge the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and pass the bill. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1754 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 1754. Persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness, and officers and enlisted men who served in the armies or navies of the United States between April 12, 1861, and August 25, 1865, being honorably discharged therefrom, shall be preferred for appointment to and retention in civil offices and employments: Provided, They are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices or employments."

SEC. 2. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts and Mr. UNDERWOOD demanded a second.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to be informed whether this is the Senate bill or the House bill?

The SPEAKER. It is a House bill.

Mr. SULZER. Why not pass the Senate bill which has already passed the Senate?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not know there was a Senate bill.

Mr. SULZER. I understand there is.

Mr. GROSVENOR. As far as I know, there is no Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no knowledge on that subject; there is no Senate bill on the Speaker's table.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GROSVENOR, and the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 109, noes 12.

So a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio in favor of the bill and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] in opposition to it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill which has been pending in Congress during all of the present Congress, having been introduced a second time to correct an error in April, 1892. It is called the "Preference bill," a measure which was asked for by the members of the Grand Army of the Republic, which is broad in its operation, benefiting the officers and enlisted men who served in the Army and Navy of the United States during the civil war, and such as were discharged in any service by reason of wounds, etc.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service and has never been reported back from that committee. This is a motion to discharge that committee and pass the bill. This bill was before the House of Representatives something like two years ago, but there was an amendment put into it that was considered unfortunate, and the result of it was that the bill was not passed. It was opposed by myself and others who felt that injustice was being done to the soldiers of the Grand Army in that way.

This is a measure that will have no very great benefit, because, necessarily, under the limitation that these men must have the efficiency and proficiency required by the rules of the civil service, makes it impossible that any very considerable number of the old Army shall be benefited by it; but it will be a token of good will, it will be a message of confidence and comfort to these men, and as such, I earnestly hope this House will pass it. [Applause.]

In the closing days of this House it will be well for us if we can send this message to these men, and another message to the Mexican pensioners, and, again, send a token of good will in the form of the Foraker bill to mark and decorate the graves of the Confederate soldiers buried from the Northern prisons and hospitals. [Applause.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this bill, but I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio this question: This bill having been introduced eleven months ago, and there now being only thirteen hours before the close of this Congress, why is it that this matter has not been attended to before?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not desire to stir up any bad blood here to-night.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Oh; this will not do that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am a man of peace always—under all circumstances.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. What hope is there that the bill will pass the Senate now, if it passes this House?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can only hope that a measure of such manifest justice will go through the Senate without delay.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If the Senate should delay the bill eleven months, as the committee having it in charge in this House has delayed it, and as the majority of this House has delayed it, what hope has the gentleman that the bill will be passed and become a law, so that we may "send out this message," as the gentleman says, to the old soldier?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, we must do the best we can—that is our duty; and if we are obstructed by a committee here and by the Senate there that is no reason why we should shirk our duty in so manifest a way as we would if we should refuse to pass this bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But you have shirked your duty for eleven long months by delaying this meritorious measure.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have never shirked my duty for eleven long minutes; I have pursued it with a zeal and constancy equal to the quest of the Holy Grail.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Well, I congratulate the gentleman on that; but his colleagues on that side have not given their cooperation in favor of this bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If my friend from Indiana and his colleagues will only help in the measure now it may be a sufficient reparation for all that is past.

Mr. GRIGGS. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. This bill refers to "officers and enlisted men who served in the Armies or Navies of the United States between April 12, 1861, and August 25, 1865." Why should it not extend up to date?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, there is really no necessity for that. The young men who served in the Spanish war do not require any aid of this character. They are able to take the examination; but these men must stand their chances with the others.

Mr. GRIGGS. I will say to the gentleman that if he will extend the time to the present date I will vote for the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. By the law as it stands the veterans of the Spanish war are allowed 15 per cent advantage in their examination.

Mr. GRIGGS. Why not give them the same privilege extended to soldiers who served between 1861 and 1865?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am trying to do this much. I should be glad, if it were practicable, to do all that the gentleman suggests.

Mr. GRIGGS. If the gentleman will permit me, I will ask unanimous consent to extend the provisions of the bill to the present date.

Mr. GROSVENOR. This is a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. GRAHAM. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio how this measure affects the apportionment of the various States. Will it interfere with the apportionment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It does not affect it at all.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio how the present law gives 15 per cent advantage to a veteran of the Spanish war, or any other veteran, in the examinations?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Because that is the law.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The law, Mr. Speaker, gives 5 per cent advantage, and it applies——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, there is a difference of opinion on that point. One gentleman says 15 per cent, and another says 5 per cent. I do not care how the fact may be. I am willing to make it 7½ per cent if that will satisfy the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The advantage to which the gentleman refers is on account of wounds or disability incurred in the line of service, and it amounts to 5 per cent only. There is the same advantage under the present law for the veteran of the Spanish war as for the veteran of the civil war.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not yielded for a speech. The gentleman from Massachusetts is totally mistaken as to what this bill provides. Let me read it, and I ask him to listen as I read it, with the proper punctuation. This bill applies only to—

Persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness.

That is one class. If they never got into a battle—if they never were in actual service, if they were stricken with sickness—it applies to them. And then we have this language:

And officers and enlisted men who served, etc.

That takes in all of them. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entirely mistaken.

Mr. GRIGGS. Will the gentleman permit me——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will not consider the subject of amendment. I can not afford to do that. I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves the balance of his time. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] is recognized in opposition to the bill.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it is, of course, unpleasant and unpopular to oppose a bill like this which appeals so to one's sentiment. But, however it may be in this House, I think in my district my opinions and actions are known so well that no one will attribute my opposition to any lack of regard or of gratitude to the veterans of the civil war.

I do not think, however, the way for us to show our regard or gratitude is by passing this bill. We owe the soldiers of the war liberal pensions. We owe them much, and are giving them homes for their old age when they are needy; but we ought not to pension them indirectly in this manner to deteriorate the civil service, and that is what this bill clearly does.

Mr. TAWNEY rose.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I will yield to the gentleman later, but not for a moment or two. This clearly does that, because it is now forty-two years since the civil war broke out, and we know that although there are some men who between 60 and 70 years of age retain their full vigor and capacity—and we see illustrations of them numerously in this House—yet they are men of originally extraordinary vigor; they are men who have both the intellectual and physical strength which generally are combined in successful men.

The gentleman who offers this bill is a good illustration. At the same time we notice that those same gentlemen here sometimes taunt each other about senility, although we appreciate that that is meant as a joke and is entirely unwarranted in fact. But we all do know that as men approach their seventieth year they have not the capacity for entering into a new clerical service and perform it as well and alertly as the men of 27, which is the average age under the civil-service appointments.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption now?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No; not for a moment. I will in a moment or two, but I wish to finish this thought now—because everybody knows that men as they approach their seventieth year can not compete with young men in a new and clerical service to which they are unaccustomed, and each year their work is not apt to improve.

Now, what to-day is burdening our civil service? What to-day is the complaint against it—the main object for attack by its opponents? It is superannuation. The enemies of civil service say that the main trouble to-day with that service is that it is full of old men, and yet this bill injects into the service men from 60 years of age upward to the preference of all others. That certainly will deteriorate the public service.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts just said that this bill proposes to pension, in effect, the old soldiers.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Indirectly.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that if this bill becomes a law no old soldier can be appointed unless he passes the civil-service examination.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, the Civil Service Commission fixes a minimum requirement?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes. I will ask the gentleman not to use too much of my time, but ask his question.

Mr. TAWNEY. They must meet that requirement?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. If they pass the civil-service examination, which is the requirement fixed by law, how, then, are we pensioning them if we give them the preference right or require that they shall be certified in preference to those who may be above them on the eligible roll?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Why, I do not think the gentleman could have listened to what I was saying.

Mr. TAWNEY. I did.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Because the reason is that they decrease in efficiency as they approach 70 years of age.

Mr. TAWNEY. Ah, but do they not meet the requirements of the law?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes; but every year, instead of keeping up the requirement, they are going to deteriorate. Now, to-day the departments are full of old men; it is the weakness everyone admits and criticises, and each year, if you admit mainly men over 60, it will grow worse. That, it seems to me, is an objection to this bill which ought to prevail, because it necessarily increases the very objection which is now made to our civil service. Then there is this further objection: It seems to me that this is wrong in principle, because if it should apply to veterans of the civil war it should apply to the veterans of every war. The same principle applies to one as to the other. If a man who serves his country in war is entitled to preference to office, then every man who serves his country in any war is entitled to it.

Mr. BROMWELL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. BROMWELL. As the law now stands there is a preference given to the soldiers of the civil war who were separated from the service by reason of wounds or sickness.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. BROMWELL. That is correct?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Please do not tell me what the law is, but ask me a question.

Mr. BROMWELL. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. BROMWELL. What I want to ask the gentleman is this: Would it not improve the service if, instead of the soldiers who have been crippled or diseased being given this preference alone, it be extended to those who were not separated from the service by reason of disease or wounds, but who are healthy, able-bodied, and sound, physically and mentally? Will not this bill result in improvement?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Why, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman, of course, put in that interjection not as a question, because I have already answered it, but in order to make his remarks. Of course it will not. The very objection which I have suggested, of the age of all these men, is enough of itself to involve filling the civil service with men from 60 years old up.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. No; I will not yield for a moment. I will take a minute or two myself. Moreover, this bill accomplishes very little good compared with the evil it accomplishes, because the very few men who can get into the service, compared with the hundreds of thousands of veterans who can not get into the service, will do the veterans very little good, and at the same time those few, compared with the few hundreds which annually enter the civil service, are enough to seriously affect the service.

So that this bill effects very little comparative good to the men it is meant to help, but it effects great comparative evil to the service.

And there is one other reason why it ought not to pass. That is because, as I say, it establishes a precedent that if the soldier of one war goes in, the soldier of every war ought to go in. And in the future the Spanish-war veteran can say with perfect logic, "If the veteran of the civil war is allowed a preference because he fought for his country, why am I not allowed that same preference because I fought for my country?"

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. It seems to me the gentleman's logic is rather funny. Will not the logical result of this bill, if it passes, be to establish a precedent that will eventually bring the Spanish war veterans into the same line as the veteran of the civil war?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Of course, that is logically so.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Then why do you not vote for this bill if you are speaking for the Spanish war veterans?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I am not speaking for the Spanish war veterans. I am speaking for the service.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. How much time have I, may I ask, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to ask the gentleman a question in reference to this bill. The bill contains a proviso providing if "they," the veterans, "are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices or employments."

Will the gentleman tell me under this bill what methods are used to ascertain if they have the necessary business requirements?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I can not tell the gentleman. That is a matter of business administration. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Three minutes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the provisions of this bill, it will disturb the present method of apportioning the civil offices among the several States of the Union. It will "shut the door of hope"—if I may be permitted to steal that phrase from the Executive—to every man who was not old enough to render service during the civil war.

There can be no good reason, it seems to me, why this law should be passed. The ample provisions that have been made for the care and comfort of the old soldier will certainly justify this Congress in giving its attention, occasionally at least, to the welfare of the other citizens of the country.

As I understand the provisions of this bill, Mr. Speaker, it will also make it possible for any man who had one day of service in the armies of the United States during the periods therein defined, by passing an examination and attaining a mark of 65 out of 100, to take precedence in appointment over a man of superior capacity, who may, for example, have obtained a marking of 95. That, Mr. Speaker, will disturb and impair the public service; and I appeal to gentlemen on this side of the House to record their votes in such a way upon this measure as will preserve to their constituents an equal opportunity to that which is offered to other citizens of the country. I yield back the balance of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I was exceedingly interested to hear from the gentleman from Ohio of the kind messages which are to go out from this House. I want to know what the message is we are sending to the Spanish war veterans.

If this bill is passed now in its present form, it will do great injustice to the Spanish war veterans. If the principle is a good one, and I am not arguing that it is, to extend the preference in our civil service to the old soldier, it should be extended to every old soldier who has offered his life for his country in time of war. [Applause.]

No one in this House knows better than I, Mr. Speaker, that the Spanish war veterans are only the shadow cast by the Grand Army of the Republic on its march toward the setting sun. No one knows better than I that to most of us has not been given the splendid privilege of facing the bullets of the enemy in the stricken field, but to many of the veterans of the civil war to whom this bill would apply that same opportunity has been denied. Yet the Spanish war veterans know, too, what it means to pass through the Valley of the Shadow of Death.

Some of them have faced the bullets of the enemy, and all of them have faced the disease and fever of the putrid camp. There is not one of them but knows what it means to see the bodies of his comrades borne to their last long home and the mourners going about the company street. Why, Mr. Speaker, should you deny to one man the meed that you accord to another, a man of greater opportunities, but no greater patriotism.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to propose an amendment to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to have an amendment to this bill considered. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If it is the character of amendment he has indicated, I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair could not hear the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I will read my amendment——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. My amendment is, "Insert after the words 'eighteen hundred and sixty-five,' in line 11, the words 'or between April 22, 1898, and August 13, 1898,'" so as to apply not only to officers and enlisted men who served in the armies and navies of the United States between April 12, 1861, and August 25, 1865, but also to the soldiers who served between April 22, 1898, and August 13, 1898.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering this amendment as pending with the bill?

Objection was made by Mr. GROSVENOR, Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi, and Mr. GRIGGS.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if more than one gentleman is going to close for the bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eleven minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, this is a very meritorious bill, one that will do justice to the veterans of the civil war. I am in favor of it. I want to see it pass unanimously. It should have passed long ago. Those responsible for the failure of this just measure will regret it in the days and years to come.

Now, my friends, all that this bill does is to give a preference—a very slight preference—to the soldiers and sailors of the Union who fought for our country between 1861 and 1865—to the men who saved the Union and made us all that we are and all that we hope to be. Now, what is that preference? It is a preference in the civil service that exists to-day in almost every State of the North. It is a preference to make the law of the land simply say that where in a civil-service examination, all things being equal among those competing in that examination, the soldier or the sailor of the Union during the civil war, who has been honorably discharged and who is in every other way thoroughly capable and well qualified, shall have the preference in appointment to office and retention in the same. That is all this bill does. That is the whole thing in a nutshell. It is fair and it is just. I believe in that, and I hope this bill will now pass this House without a dissenting vote.

Let me say here again what I have often said before, that I am now, ever have been, and always expect to be the true and the sincere friend of the men who saved our country in the greatest hour of its peril. We owe them a debt we can never pay. They are entitled to our everlasting gratitude, and gratitude, my friends, is the fairest flower that sheds its perfume in the human heart. [Applause.] Let us be grateful lest we forget. My sympathy will always be with the brave boys who went to the front in the greatest crisis in all our country's history. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, we are in the dying hours of the Fifty-seventh Congress. It is nearly midnight, and to-morrow at noon we will adjourn sine die. This bill has been in Congress for years. How is it, I ask, that it never passes? Why is it always put off until the final hours? I know it will pass this House now, but too late, I fear, to reach the Senate and pass there. A very similar bill was defeated in this way in the closing hours of the Fifty-sixth Congress. It is the old, old story of broken promises—promises made to the ear and broken to the hope. The Republicans do not keep faith with the Union veterans. How much longer can they be fooled? I hope the fate of this bill will open their eyes and cause them to think.

The subject-matter of this bill, sir, was introduced in this House on the 2d day of December, 1901. From that day to this it has slept in a Republican committee of this House. H. R. 14105, now before the House, was introduced April 29, 1902. Appeal after appeal, effort after effort, has been made by the friends of the measure to get it reported, but without avail. Who has been responsible? The Republicans. And I ask if this bill fails to become a law at this time, who must take the responsibility? The Republicans. How much longer will you deny the just demands of the old veterans? How much longer must they wait—and wait in vain? Republicans, you must answer.

Let us keep our word. Let us be just and make this bill a law. It is not yet too late. The Republican leaders in this House and in the Senate can do so if they are sincere and mean what they say. I am with the veterans, and I am opposed to fooling them. It is late, but if we act quickly it is not too late. Republicans, in the name of justice, in the name of gratitude, will you do it? These grand old battle-scarred veterans are not asking much. There is little, very little, that we can do now or hereafter to fittingly repay the heroic soldiers and sailors of the Union. They deserve much. What they did will never perish. I say again, I have always been with them, and what is more, I always will be with them so long as I live. [Applause.]

The ranks of the Grand Army are thinning out. Call the illustrious roll to-day and the silence tells the story. In a few years they will be no more. As the years come and go they are getting fewer and fewer, and we all know the time is not far distant when the old soldier and sailor of the Union will be a sacred memory of the past. But, sir, while they are here, while the few yet live, I say, let us give them the preference in the same spirit that they gave their lives, their blood, their fortunes, and their best efforts for the safety, the greatness, and the perpetuity of our glorious Union in the mightiest struggle in war that ever shook the world. [Applause.]

I believe, Mr. Speaker, my Democratic colleagues are with me in my efforts to do justice to the veterans of the civil war. I am glad to know this, and I am surprised, sir, to hear my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] compare the soldiers and the sailors of the greatest civil strife in the history of the world with the soldiers on dress parade during the Spanish-American war. [Laughter.] That war was a ninety-day affair—a military holiday. The Spaniards were not in it at all. Why, everybody wanted to go, I believe, to the Spanish-American war——

Mr. WACHTER. Did you?

Mr. SULZER. Yes, my benighted friend; I wanted to go very badly. [Laughter.] The Republicans, however, wouldn't let me. They were afraid I might come back. [Laughter.] The records of this House, and at Albany, N. Y., and in the War Department here, will tell the story if my friend will look them up. I organized a regiment in New York City to go to that war, but I was not permitted to muster it in by either a Republican governor of New York or a Republican President, presumably on account of my politics. [Applause.] Oh, yes; I wanted to go mighty bad, but I was forced to stay at home and fight Spain in Congress by the Republican governor of the State of New York. [Laughter.] He thought at that time that I might come back and be a candidate in 1898 for governor [laughter], but he was watching the wrong man; another citizen of New York State also organized a regiment and got it mustered in, and he came back and succeeded Frank S. Black as governor, and that man is now President Roosevelt. Brother Black had his eye on the wrong man, and history is different—but my friend can read all about it in the archives of his country. Now, my friends, I think we all agree that there is no comparison between the terrific struggle from 1861 to 1865 and the Spanish-American war. When I look back upon the war with Spain it pales into insignificance in comparison with the former mighty conflict. Sometimes now I really feel sorry for Spain, although you all know I was one of the chief members here who from 1895 to 1898, in season and out of season, never failed to denounce Spain and demand the freedom of Cuba. [Applause and laughter.]

But, Mr. Speaker, thrashing Spain was a good deal like a giant kicking a cripple. We should not crow too much about it. History will set it all right, and give every man his true place in that momentary international triumph of American arms on land and sea.

Mr. SIMS. Have you forgotten Funston?

Mr. SULZER. Not at all; Funston is swimming along all right. [Laughter.]

But, sir, Thackeray—that great master of English diction—once upon a time was constrained to facetiously remark—that "comparisons are odious." Now, I am not a Thackeray, and it is not my purpose to make comparisons between the soldiers of this war or the soldiers of that war. They all did their duty. They were all brave soldiers. They were all true Americans. They all loved their country and were willing to die that it might live and triumph.

I am a friend of the Spanish-American war veterans. No braver men ever faced a foe. Their glory will live while our history is a memory, and the work they did for struggling liberty in Cuba and for humanity in Porto Rico will ever be an imperishable monument to their valor, their heroism, and their glory. They, too, deserve our help, our consideration, and our eternal gratitude. Feeling about this matter as I do—speaking from my heart—and imbued with the sentiments I now express, I would like to see the veterans of the Spanish-American war stand side by side with the old guard of the civil war in this bill, and I say for one here that I will vote for such an amendment with as much pleasure as I shall vote for this bill. But whether this amendment is adopted now or not, it is bound to come in the next Congress, and the time will soon be at hand when every soldier and every sailor of the Republic who can show an honorable discharge, no matter in what war he fought, will stand on an equal footing before the law of the land in regard to preferences in civil appointments.

Now, sir, I am for this bill with all my heart. Let us pass it and hurry it over to the Senate and pass it there ere we adjourn. If we pass it here and let it die in the Senate it will do no good, but cause sadness and disappointment to thousands and thousands of the bravest men the world has ever seen. I say to the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber that if this bill fails to become a law during this Congress, they will be held responsible for its defeat. How will you ever be able to explain why you left it in the committee for fifteen months, and now, on the eve of adjournment, move to discharge the committee from further consideration and try to pass it under a suspension of the rules, when you know it is so late in the session that it is extremely improbable if it can pass the Senate? The responsibility is yours. If this bill dies in the Senate, the Republican party kills it. Soldiers and sailors of the Union, remember this.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to print, in connection with my remarks, some data.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SULZER. The report in 1900 of the committee on legislation for veterans in public service, made at Chicago, was as follows:

To the Thirty-fourth National Encampment,
Grand Army of the Republic, greeting:

COMRADES: The committee on legislation for veterans in public service, appointed by the commander in chief, submit the following report. Regrettably, but necessarily so, it is one of progress:

PROGRESS REPORTS.

Progress reports are not always satisfactory, particularly if they concern a subject that has been hammered at, unsuccessfully, for twenty years; especially so when hard, earnest, devoted work for simple justice to war veterans during all those years produces little or no effect on those who make our laws.

Less than forty years ago the Armies and Navy of the Republic, through their great leaders, began to make progress reports. These latter, representing an unparalleled sacrifice of life and health and limb to men and of suffering to women and children, borne without murmur or complaint during four years of cruel war, did not partake of the idea "how not to do it." The paramount issue then was the Union. There was no dispute about that. To meet it no sacrifice was regarded too great.

The progress reported from the battle line finally gave satisfactory assurance to the American people at home that war would cease and peace come again. This result was reached. When the struggle ended the issue was settled right, and settled forever. The Union was saved, our nation made forever free, and joy reigned throughout the land.

But what of the survivors of those who wrought out so much for free government and humanity? Has there been any such hope for them as Appomattox gave to the people? Have they been remembered? Have their material interests been regarded; and if not, why? The pathway is strewn with promises. Alas! Promises made to the ear, but broken to the hope; and hope deferred maketh the heart sick. 'Twas ever so.

As the result of war, two obligations were incurred. One was financial. It required money, principal and interest, to liquidate this. And the promise to pay was well kept. The other was sacrifice. To be canceled by gratitude. Not in eloquent words, but acts. To care for him who had borne the battle, the widows and orphans of the fallen, and to suitably recognize those who survived. How? Pensions to those who deserved them; a reasonable preference in the public service to those who were worthy and sought needed employment. This in justice. In incurring this obligation of sacrifice, a national debt was created. None more sacred. In settling it, political considerations have no rightful share. Such sacrifice was above all politics. Gratitude is ever a paramount issue.

A SAD REFLECTION.

In the light of our present greatness as a leading power in the affairs of the world, the history of free government in America, having its origin with the liberty-loving pilgrim fathers who landed at Plymouth Rock, embodied and emphasized in the Declaration of Independence, fought for to success in the Revolution, and made absolutely secure in the sixties, the cause continually progressing—and ever in blood and sacrifice while the battle raged—some self-evident facts are apparent. It must not be forgotten that into the four years of 1861-65 were crowded four centuries of human progress of an advanced civilization. A just payment of one obligation to those who did this and still survive is long past due.

Yet a sad reflection is found for us in the knowledge we have, as representatives of the survivors of those who fought for union and freedom and liberty successfully then, that thirty-five years after that war closed committees of this body are still reporting progress concerning an important matter. The fulfillment of a promise involving not a dollar of appropriation, but to which the honor and good faith of the people were then pledged, ever since unredeemed.

Even now history is repeating itself. What we have experienced of neglect and indifference for many years others are now finding out. Young men who served in the war with Spain, in Cuba and in the Philippines, are walking the streets seeking employment from door to door. And finding it not. Is this right?

Looking over the debates of the Congresses there can be found many kind words spoken for the soldier and sailor, but absolutely nothing in way of statutory law insuring to those who enter the military or naval service in times of war—serving until the end of their terms of enlistment or the close of hostilities, being honorably discharged—a reasonable preference in the public service in times of peace. Pensions, yes. Will any American urge that any meager pittance as a pension doled out compensates loss of manhood—the manhood that was ready to sacrifice life itself, voluntarily, in battle, in order that the Republic might survive—and the inherent desire to earn bread by labor? Perish the thought! We will not believe it.

THE PREFERENCE BILL.

Early in the Fifty-sixth Congress, viz, December 6-7, 1899, in order to carry out the expressed wishes of the thirty-third national encampment, Grand Army of the Republic, held at Philadelphia, a bill was introduced by Mr. THOMAS C. PLATT, of New York, in the Senate (S. 283), and by Mr. JAMES A. TAWNEY, of Minnesota, in the House (H. R. 2583). The loyal service of both these gentlemen commands our admiration, and they well deserve your thanks. In the Senate it was referred to the Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service, of which Mr. Jonathan Ross, of Vermont, is chairman, and in the House to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, of which Mr. FREDERICK H. GILLETT, of Massachusetts is chairman. Its text was as follows:

"A bill in reference to the civil service and appointments thereunder.

"Be it enacted, etc., That in every Executive Department of the United States Government, and in each and every branch thereof, whether reached by competitive or noncompetitive examinations under the civil-service laws (in which case the rules and regulations affecting the same shall so provide), honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, or marines, who served as such between April 12, 1861, and August 26, 1865, shall be certified and preferred for appointment to and retention in employment in the public service, and for promotion therein; age, loss of limb, or other physical impairment which does not in fact incapacitate, shall not disqualify them, provided they possess the business capacity necessary to discharge the duties of the position involved. And persons thus preferred shall not be removed from their position except for good cause, upon charges and after a hearing.

"SEC. 2. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

The language was identical with S. 3256, which had passed the Senate, but failed of consideration in the House, though favorably reported thereto, in the Fifty-fifth Congress. Both in Senate and House, bills of similar import were introduced by others. Among these, H. R. 5779, by Mr. JACOB H. BROMWELL, of Ohio. This latter, accompanied by a report by Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS, of Indiana, was the one reported to the House.

IN THE SENATE.

Senate bill 283 was reported back with an amendment, March 22, 1900, the Senate Committee inserting after the words "sixty-five," the following in italics: or in the recent war with Spain or in the Philippine Islands, they being otherwise duly qualified, etc. (as in the original bill).

Your committee, through personal interviews and by correspondence with nearly every member of the Senate committee, endeavored to secure a modification of the amended bill by striking out the word or and prefacing the other italicized words with the following, in small caps: AND FIRST AFTER VETERANS OF THE CIVIL WAR, THOSE WHO SERVED, etc. (as in the amended bill). But they would then listen to nothing. Mr. HOAR, of Massachusetts, and Mr. FORAKER, of Ohio, insisted that the amendment should remain as it was. The bill passed the Senate in the form reported, May 16, and the chairman of your committee, he being then department commander of New York, and the annual encampment in session at Utica, was so advised by Mr. PLATT, of New York, by wire. The very next day, however, May 17, somewhat strange to relate, in the absence from the Senate of Mr. PLATT, as your committee is advised, on motion of Mr. HOAR, the bill was recalled from the House, where it had been received and referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, its passage by the Senate being on a later day reconsidered by that body, and it was returned to the Senate committee. The facts are stated. The reasons for them are unknown to us.

The committee accorded a hearing on the bill May 31. Two sessions were held. We urged consideration on the line of our proposed modification. Present to oppose it were the president of the United States Civil Service Commission and a representative of the Civil Service Reform League. Neither has ever been friendly to the veteran. The bill is still in the Senate committee, not being again reported prior to adjournment. The members of your committee present, aided by Comrades E. C. Johnson and J. W. Cobaugh and Department Commander of the Potomac G. H. Slaybaugh and Special Aid George H. Patrick, as also that earnest friend of the veteran, ex-Congressman James R. Howe, who accompanied the chairman of your committee from Brooklyn on this errand, did what they could to secure action on the bill, but without avail.

HOUSE COMMITTEE ON REFORM IN THE CIVIL SERVICE.

H. R. 2583, upon the organization of the House Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, was placed in the hands of a subcommittee consisting of Messrs. C. B. LANDIS, Indiana; JAMES R. MANN, Illinois; WILLIAM ELLIOTT, South Carolina, and CHARLES N. FOWLER, New Jersey. This subcommittee met June 2, a quorum was present, Mr. ELLIOTT being absent, and by a majority vote of that quorum decided to report the bill to the full committee. That the bill was so reported, credit is due solely to Mr. LANDIS and Mr. FOWLER. Upon the announcement of the subcommittee that they were ready to report, all else depended.

At the meeting of the House committee held June 4, eight of its thirteen members being present—seven constituting a quorum—your committee was accorded a hearing. Following that, as your committee are advised, it was decided to amend and substitute the Bromwell bill (H. R. 5779)—Mr. BROMWELL was a member of the committee—for that of others pending of a similar nature, including the Tawney bill (H. R. 2583), and to report it with the modification asked for by your committee, and this was done. For the favorable report of a majority of the quorum on this bill by the committee to the House—and it needed five votes—we are indebted to Messrs. C. B. LANDIS, Indiana; J. H. BROMWELL, Ohio; J. D. BOWERSOCK, Kansas; M. H. Glynn, New York, and J. F. Fitzgerald, Massachusetts. It was a distinguished service, and they should be kindly remembered for it. The others present at the meeting of the committee were F. H. GILLETT, Massachusetts, chairman; J. F. LACEY, Iowa, and C. N. FOWLER, New Jersey.

THE HOUSE COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

The Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5779) in reference to the civil service and appointments thereunder, submit the following report:

"In the matter of the appointment of persons to positions in the Executive Departments of the Government under existing laws, soldiers and sailors who incurred disabilities in the service (the discharge must show that fact—J. W. K.) and who have taken the civil-service examination are to be preferred.

"Under the provisions of the bill herewith reported this preference will extend to and include all honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, or marines who served as such between April 12, 1861, and August 25, 1865, and to those honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, or marines who served in the recent war with Spain or in the Philippine Islands, without reference to the disabilities they may have incurred in the service. Under the present law the right of preference is based upon disabilities. Under the proposed bill the right of preference is based upon the service and ability of the soldier, sailor, or marine who has served during the time of war and has an honorable discharge.

"The present law has given rise to a great deal of dissatisfaction among soldiers and sailors, for the reason that the man who may have served only one month or less, if during that service he incurred any disability (causing him to be discharged from the service—J. W. K.), is given preference in the matter of employment by the Government over the soldier or sailor who may have served from the beginning until the close of the war, enduring all the hardships and privations incident to that service, but incurring no permanent disabilities.

"Your committee have thought it well to include those who served in the recent war with Spain or in the Philippines, being honorably discharged, giving them preference first after veterans of the civil war. The passage of this bill will not in any way affect the operation of the civil-service law, rules, or regulations with respect to examinations for appointment. Soldiers and sailors, under the provisions of this proposed law, who apply for positions will be required as now to pass the civil-service examination, the preference applying only in selection of persons from the eligible list.

"The proposed bill also applies to promotions as well as to appointments, and, if passed, will prevent the removal of any soldier or sailor except for good cause and upon charges and after a hearing.

"Believing that the discrimination which the present law makes against the soldier or sailor who has an honorable record of service, but who was fortunate enough not to incur any permanent disability (requiring his discharge from service—J. W. K.) is neither right nor just, your committee therefore recommend the passage of this bill."

PUBLIC OFFICE—PRIVATE SNAP.

Instead of public office being a "public trust," it is too frequently regarded as "a private snap." This idea permeates all our Government, in spots. An honorable discharge from the military or naval service—the greatest badge of honor that can come to any citizen in this Republic—as a recommendation when applying for employment to public officials, ought by them to be respected. In some departments, however, in recent years the badge or button of the Grand Army of the Republic, evidencing service and sacrifice in the "days which tried men's souls"—notably so in the navy-yard at Brooklyn, N. Y.—is not alone regarded with disfavor by some of the "little bosses" there, but makes him who wears it the subject of ridicule and not seldom of insulting language, unworthy to come from one who claims to be an American; and besides this, though preferred for appointment, veterans are the first discharged, and usually in such a way that they can not hope to get back. This is no fancied picture.

While such conduct has not the approval of Hon. John D. Long, Secretary of the Navy, who has many times when appealed to shown in various ways his regard for the just claims of veterans of war, the statute affecting employment at navy-yards and the system in vogue of making the "petty boss" sole judge, jury, and executioner concerning the merits of men, when reductions of force are made necessary for any cause, permits it. Some of these bosses hate the veteran who is a Grand Army man. The fact that no statutory law protects worthy veterans enables discriminations and wrong, many times due to prejudice alone, being done to them.

PRACTICAL GRATITUDE.

Engrafted in the constitution of the State of New York, by vote of the people and becoming operative January 1, 1895, is found the following:

"ARTICLE V., SECTION 9. * * * Appointments and promotions in the civil service of the State, and of all the civil divisions thereof, including cities and villages, shall be made according to merit and fitness, to be ascertained, so far as practicable, by examinations, which, so far as practicable, shall be competitive: Provided, however, That honorably discharged soldiers and sailors from the Army and Navy of the United States in the late civil war, who are citizens and residents of this State, shall be entitled to preference in appointment and promotion, without regard to their standing on any list from which such appointment or promotion may be made. Laws shall be made to provide for the enforcement of this section."

Here is an example of practical gratitude which is significant. If the debt of one State, to all veterans of the Union, is thus regarded and recognized by its people, what about the debt of other States? What about the debt of the States united? The latter debt is the greater.

THE PRESIDENT.

During the year the chairman of your committee has many times had occasion to go to our comrade, William McKinley, President of the United States, in the interest of other comrades who needed help or protection. And never in vain. Numerous restorations to the public service of veterans wronged gave needed help, and some sweeping reforms in ideas of administration adopted by him for the protection of other veterans in their rights have produced good results for our people in other directions.

A letter of the President to the Cabinet officers dated July 12, 1899, requiring that where in any place in the civil service exempted from examination under an Executive order of May 29, preceding, a position was held by any honorably discharged soldier or sailor of either war, he should not be removed therefrom until the papers in the case had first been sent to him, personally, was far-reaching. In line with the desire of your committee to establish the principle for which we are now contending in the form of a statutory law, that service in war is entitled to recognition by retention and continuance in the employment of the Government in times of peace, this well-intended action was a long stride in the right direction.

The example of the President is one worthy to be regarded by all subordinates.

Of like character, in effect, was a peremptory order issued by the President in January last to the United States Civil Service Commission, to submit an amended rule so that where a veteran of the war became disconnected from the civil service through no fault or misconduct on his own part, and was restored, accepting a minor place in order that he might help provide for himself and his family, that, on the recommendation of the appointing officer, he could be fully reinstated at the highest compensation he had received before becoming disconnected from the service. Such a rule was submitted and signed, being now known as Rule XI. Many veterans were thereby benefited. And the unjust precedents in this direction established for eight years by the United States Civil Service Commission, were set aside. These no longer exist to oppress the worthy veteran or rob him of his rights.

THE LAST WORDS.

"The agony and bloody sweat are over. Lip service has again been tried and found wanting. Hypocrisy and low cunning prevail. God help the veteran. Good-by."

The foregoing were the last penned words in the contest waged by your committee at the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, for rights. They were written at 4 p. m. June 7. By whom written, to whom addressed, is not material here. Voicing despair, they contain a rebuke to some of the lawmakers of the nation during thirty-five years last past, richly deserved. Due regard being given to the many expressions of national encampments on the subject of the veteran in the public service, to the work of the committees appointed by them from time to time for many years—and which has been performed without money and without price—in this behalf, to the supreme justice of our cause and the indifference shown to these appeals, sufficient reason is found for the expressions referred to. And they were not without effect. In less than five minutes Mr. BROMWELL of Ohio had the floor. It seemed as though justice was about to progress to some purpose. But pages 7455 and 7457 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that day best tell what happened. Read and ponder. We quote:

CIVIL SERVICE APPOINTMENTS FOR HONORABLY DISCHARGED SOLDIERS, ETC.

Mr. BROMWELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"A bill (H. R. 5779) giving preference to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines in all appointments in the civil service of the United States.

"Be it enacted, etc., That in every Executive Department of the United States Government and in each and every branch thereof, whether reached by competitive or noncompetitive examinations under the civil-service laws (in which case the rules and regulations affecting the same shall so provide), honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, or marines who served as such between April 12, 1861, and August 26, 1865, shall be certified and preferred for appointment to and retention in employment in the public service and for promotion therein. Age, loss of limb, or other physical impairment which does not in fact incapacitate shall not disqualify them, provided they possess the business capacity necessary to discharge the duties of the position involved; and persons thus preferred shall not be removed from their positions except for good cause, upon charges, and after a hearing.

"SEC. 2. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

The amendment reported by the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service was read. as follows:

"After '1865,' in line 10, insert 'and first after the aforementioned veterans of the civil war, those honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the recent war with Spain or in the Philippine Islands, they being otherwise qualified.'"

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. LENTZ. I do not rise to object; I want an answer to one question. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL] tell me whether this bill enlarges the provisions already contained in our statutes on this subject?

Mr. BROMWELL. It does to this extent: Under the present law the veterans of the civil war are given a preference in these appointments, provided they are not incapacitated by wounds or disease. This extends the law to all honorably discharged soldiers. And then an amendment has been reported by the committee providing that after the veterans of the civil war preference shall be given in these civil-service appointments to "honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the recent war with Spain or in the Philippine Islands."

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection?

Mr. LENTZ. I have no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I object.

Mr. CLAYTON of Alabama. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will withdraw his objection.

Mr. BROMWELL. I move the rules be suspended in order that this bill may be considered and put on its passage with the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BROMWELL. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. Let the Chair state the question. The gentleman from Ohio moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill which has just been read with the amendment indicated.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Ohio whether this is the House bill?

Mr. BROMWELL. This, Mr. Speaker, is the so-called Grand Army bill, which was introduced under the auspices of the grand encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic. It is a House bill.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, this is a good bill. I am heartily in favor of its passage. It should have been reported long ago. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio why it has not been reported and passed before, so that the Senate could act on it? Why is it brought up to be passed in the last hour of the session? Is it a bluff (like the antitrust bill) to fool the old soldiers? At all events the bill should pass, and I hope there will be no objection to it. It should have passed this House early in the session.

Mr. BROMWELL. I will answer the gentleman by saying that this bill was considered by the Committee on Civil Service Reform only last Monday. It was reported to the House; but the business of the House has been such that it was impossible to call it up under suspension of the rules; and, as the gentleman well knows, it would have been impossible probably to obtain unanimous consent, as has been evidenced here to-day by the fact that it was objected to by the gentleman from Mississippi. Now, then, we have only a few moments left in which to pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. This debate is all out of order.

Mr. SULZER. The only complaint that I have to make is that you did not bring up and pass the bill before.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I demand a second.

Mr. BROMWELL. May I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I object.

The Chair appointed as tellers Mr. BROMWELL and Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 98, noes 9.

The SPEAKER. The motion is seconded.

Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi. No quorum present.

Several MEMBERS (on the Democratic side). Oh, no; do not make that point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN] makes the point that no quorum is present.

Mr. MERCER. I make the point that that is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count the House.

[One hundred and sixty-three members were counted as present.]

Mr. BROMWELL. Before the final announcement of this count, I wish to say this: In view of the fact that there are but thirty-five minutes left before the final adjournment and that forty minutes for debate can be claimed under the rule, and in view of the dilatory tactics of some gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, it is evident that it will be impossible to get a roll call on this bill, which will probably be demanded. [Cries of "Regular order!"] I therefore ask permission to withdraw the bill from the consideration of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Just one moment, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I object to the withdrawal of this bill by the gentleman from Ohio. Inasmuch as he has chosen to inject politics into this matter, I desire to say, as a member of the committee reporting this bill, that this measure was supported by Mr. Glynn and myself in the committee. I think it is a proper bill, and we should make every effort to have it passed.

Mr. DALZELL. I move that the House take a recess until 10 minutes before 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not authorized to submit that motion in the absence of a quorum.

Mr. DALZELL. There has been no announcement of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has announced the number present—not enough to make a quorum. The Chair is not advised of any new arrivals in the Hall.

Mr. SULZER. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. This is the regular order.

Other members having entered the Hall, the Speaker announced 178, a quorum, present.

"FRATERNITY MEANS SOMETHING."

Among the declared tenets of faith of the Grand Army of the Republic is found the proclamation, "Fraternity without regard to former rank is the broad foundation stone on which our order rests." This means cohesion. Clannishness, if you will. It naturally follows, then, that help and protection to a worthy comrade requiring it, enjoined by its constitution, is a paramount duty. One that may not pass unheeded. The material welfare of one, even the humblest among us, is the concern of every other comrade. An injury or injustice to one becomes the cause of all. Have we been true?

In two essentials of obligation veterans ought to be a unit. The first is that vigilance be exercised to see that the pension laws enacted are executed in a spirit of honesty and fairness to the deserving soldier and sailor, and to the dependent widows and orphans. In none others are we interested. The second, to secure legislation accomplishing and then guard well the right to a preference of worthy veterans for public employment. An honorable discharge from service and present ability ought to be the only passports required by them for such preference.

The sentiment expressed by one of the later mayors of a now extinguished great city, who, concerning the claims for appointment of a man who had lost one arm in the service, and by reason of another wound was, since the war, compelled to carry a leg in splints, said, "That is ancient history," will not find lodgment in the hearts of the American people. And the minds of the lawmakers of the nation should not be perverted by any such thought.

DECLARATION FOR RIGHTS.

It was long ago written, "Who would be free, themselves must strike the blow." What this organization most needs now is to proclaim a new Declaration of Independence—this time for rights. The prior right of veterans to serve in times of peace the country for which they fought in war. Preference in its public employ. Compensating wages by labor. And in fraternity, charity, and loyalty—one for all and all for one—again do battle to secure and have such right enforced.

That "government of the people, by the people, and for the people" might not perish from the earth, was the task once committed to our care. With what result the whole world is familiar.

That the war for the Union and what it cost in sacrifice may not be forgotten, nor its survivors be belittled—particularly by the politicians—in this day and generation, is the supreme duty, with us, in this hour.

That volunteer service in the Armies and Navy of the United States, in times of war, deserves not alone emulation and praise, but to those who survive and are honorably discharged, being worthy and capable, preferment for appointment, promotion, and retention in the public service in times of peace, is a principle to which we ought to stand committed, now and forever.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

We ask this encampment to approve and indorse the present report.

We recommend that the work of this committee be pressed by a committee of the Grand Army of the Republic during the coming year, or until the object in view in its appointment has been secured; and to aid in accomplishing that end, that a copy of this report, including the action of this encampment thereon, be sent to each post in our organization, with instructions that the same shall be read at the meeting of the post next succeeding its receipt and a resolution adopted by it approving of and urging upon Congress the passage of H. R. 5779 (the veteran preference in employment measure) now pending in the House of Representatives; that the Senators and Representatives in Congress be fully advised of such action by comrades, and that a copy of the resolution adopted by the post, officially signed by the commander and adjutant, be forwarded to the adjutant-general of the Grand Army of the Republic.

CONCLUSION.

Many little things occurring in the last battle of the campaign for justice, commencing with May 31 and ending June 7, only when the gavel fell and the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress stood adjourned, might be told, but we refrain. Perhaps an awakened conscience may cause a change of heart in some directions. We shall hope so. And as to our friends, they will remain loyal and true. It is well to say that President McKinley gave us his personal assurance that the bill now pending on the Calendar of the House (H. R. 5779) met with his approval; and Speaker HENDERSON, on the day after the adjournment, said to the chairman of your committee concerning it that "prompt consideration will be given the bill on the reassembling of Congress." The promise of "help in December" may be redeemed. We shall rely upon it, anyhow.

Fraternally, yours,

JOS. W. KAY, New York, Chairman,
CHAS. BURROWS, New Jersey,
ISAAC F. MACK, Ohio,
H. H. CUMMINGS, Pennsylvania,
W. W. ELDRIDGE, Potomac,
Commtttee.

CHICAGO, ILL., August 29, 1900.

And this was promulgated to the posts of the entire order, officially, as follows:

Circular No. 1.

HEADQUARTERS GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC,
St. Louis, Mo., September 13, 1900.

The accompanying "report of the committee on legislation for veterans in the public service" was approved and indorsed and the recommendations of the same adopted by the thirty-fourth national encampment, held at Chicago, Ill., August 29, 1900.

Complying with such action, the posts of our order are hereby requested to take due notice thereof and be governed thereby. A simple form of resolution only is required. Such a form as may be used, if agreeable, accompanies this circular. When action has been taken by the post, comrades are requested, if convenient, to see the United States Senators from their States and Representatives in Congress from their respective districts, advising them of the action taken by the post, and its wishes concerning the veteran preference law (H. R. 5779). Such resolution as may be adopted should be duly authenticated by adding the signatures of the commander and adjutant of the post (and seal, by posts having one) and then be mailed promptly, addressed F. M. Sterrett, Adjutant-General G. A. R., St. Louis, Mo.

This important work, which has been so ably and satisfactorily presented and advanced by the committee having charge of same, can easily be made the law of the land if the comrades perform the service herein required of them. Commanders and adjutants are specially enjoined to secure action without unnecessary delay.

Fraternally yours,

LEO RASSIEUR,
Commander in Chief.

Official:
F. M. STERRETT,
Adjutant-General.

———, 1900.

At a regular meeting of —— —— Post, No. ——, Department of —— ——, Grand Army of the Republic, held at its headquarters —— ——, on the above date, after reading and duly considering the "report of the committee on legislation for veterans in the public service," made to the thirty-fourth national encampment at Chicago, Ill., August 29, 1900, the action of said encampment thereon, and the circular of the commander in chief, it was unanimously

Resolved, That this post approves and urges upon the Fifty-sixth Congress of the United States, at its session in December, the prompt passage of H. R. 5779 (the veteran-preference measure) as an act of justice long delayed.

A transcript from the record.

Concerning what resulted therefrom, officially reported, page 103 of the Journal of the thirty-fifth national encampment, held at Cleveland, Ohio, in 1901, over the signature of F. M. Sterrett, adjutant-general Grand Army of the Republic, contains the following:

LEGISLATION.

The adjutant-general received resolutions from 1,287 posts, located in 44 departments of the Grand Army of the Republic, indorsing the veterans' preference law, as set forth in House resolution 5779, before the Fifty-sixth Congress of the United States, which was forwarded by him to the committee on legislation for the Grand Army of the Republic, authorized by the national encampment. The number of each post, with the name of the department, was collated on 23 typewritten pages, which, being bound, the following indorsement was placed thereon: "To be filed with the custodian of records, under the seal of the order, Independence Hall, Philadelphia, Pa., as a refutation of the charge made by Hon. WM. P. HEPBURN, of Iowa, on the floor of Congress when the veterans' preference law, House resolution 5779, was under discussion in December, 1900, when he said, 'No one is authorized to speak for these men.'"

The report of the "committee on legislation for veterans in public service," made at Cleveland, Ohio, in September, 1901, was as follows:

To the Thirty-fifth National Encampment, Grand Army of the Republic, greeting:

COMRADES: The "committee on legislation for veterans in the public service," appointed by the commander in chief in accordance with action authorizing it taken by the thirty-fourth national encampment, held at Chicago, Ill., August 29-30, 1900, strongly reaffirming the principles declared on the subject-matter and the views of the bounden duty of all comrades of our great organization concerning it and other things, as set forth and expressed in its last previous report, now submit the following:

While the last report was one of progress and of hope, based on promises made by the Speaker of the House and others, and encouragement given by our comrade, the President of the United States, concerning the desired legislation, on all which your committee placed reliance, the result shows only disaster. Yet the Union forces, as a body, never despaired of the grand results finally achieved by them during the civil war, and hence this grand organization must not despair, regardless of the character or strength of the foes it is called upon to meet in this, its present war for justice.

THE VETERAN PREFERENCE LAWS.

Much misunderstanding exists concerning the veteran preference laws and their scope. What they are should be made plain. The text of section 1754, Revised Statutes, United States, is herein given. So also is the civil-service rule of October 29, 1884, secured only after a long struggle by the present chairman of this committee. The statute is mandatory as to those covered by it; and since the promulgation of the rule, boards of examiners have allowed the preference in certification necessary to those entitled to preference under the statute who are found eligible through competitive examination.

Otherwise, even they could not be appointed. In operation, the beneficiaries of both statute and rule are, to the extent of 45 per cent, soldiers and sailors of the Regular and Volunteer Army and Navy, who enlisted and served since 1865. No preference whatever is accorded to those who were honorably discharged at the expiration of their terms of enlistment, or by reason of the ending of the civil war. And it matters not how many times a man was wounded.

The foregoing statement is true despite the wrong perpetrated on such men by an inspired article emanating from Washington (the Civil Service Reform League, likely), which appeared in the public press of the country while the veterans' preference bill was pending in Congress, wherein it was made to appear that all veterans of the civil war were given a preference. The United States Civil Service Commission, though urgently requested to do so by this committee, failed to set the matter right. Hence more false teaching was scattered among the people.

There is a law concerning the matter of retention of veterans already in the service. The force and applicability of that has recently been denied by the collector of customs and the collector of internal revenue at New York. And this denial appears to have been sustained by the head of one of the Executive Departments, viz, the Secretary of the Treasury. This furnishes one reason for an appeal to the President.

Chapter 287, laws of 1876, embodied in Statutes at Large, United States (vol. 19), is in part as follows:

"* * * Provided, That in making any reduction of force in any of the Executive Departments, the head of such Department shall retain those persons who may be equally qualified who have been honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States, and the widows and orphans of deceased sailors and soldiers."

The laws above referred to or quoted are the only ones which provide a preference for veterans, either for appointment to or retention in the public service and, except for a recommendatory statute, section 1755, the spirit of which was gratitude, but is without force, no other legislation on the subject has been enacted. Some changes of civil-service rules affecting veterans who become disconnected from the public service, in regard to reinstatement, have been made. And that is all.

IN THE HOUSE.

The defeat of the Bromwell bill (H. R. 5779) in the House of Representatives December 17, 1900, was most decisive. Concerning what then took place reference is made to pages 383-387 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, second session Fifty-sixth Congress. We will not take the time to inflict upon you the sad story to which the public records bear witness in the debate on this bill It shows an immense amount of inexcusable and lamentable lack of knowledge on the part of many men in public life—some of whom we call comrade—regarding existing statute laws affecting the preference and status of veterans in the public service; or could it have been a fear of the Civil-Service Reform League, whose noisy opposition to this measure and the veteran on general principles is baseless and without good reason, for otherwise, it is strong evidence of willful misrepresentation and deceit, all the more harmful and reprehensible when emanating from high public officials, especially to be regretted if coming from those who served in the Union forces, and who therefore would be supposed to know the law and the facts, as well as the justice and necessity of such a law being enacted, and to speak the truth in matters concerning their comrades.

A quotation or two in support of the foregoing statement will suffice. For instance:

Mr. HEPBURN (Iowa), a comrade, said:

"I do not believe that anybody has the right to speak for those men who might be benefited by this law, and say that he represents them.

"I do not believe that those men who served between 1861 and 1865, or the masses of them, ask for this legislation." * * *

* * * "Under the law as it is to-day, preference is required in matters of appointment, other things being equal, to the old soldier." * * *

Mr. GROSVENOR (Ohio), a comrade also, said:

"Mr. Speaker, I greatly desire the passage of some legislation upon this subject, but I join the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] in the criticisms which he has made." * * *

It is fair to assume that both these men knew better, because they received the former report of your committee, and the action of the thirty-fourth national encampment on same was known to them. In addition, they had long experience as lawmakers of the nation.

Sharing in the debate, besides Speaker HENDERSON, were BROMWELL and GROSVENOR, Ohio; RICHARDSON and SIMS, Tennessee; FOWLER, New Jersey; HEPBURN and LACEY, Iowa; TALBERT, South Carolina; BINGHAM, Pennsylvania; WHEELER, Kentucky; MOODY, MCCALL, and GILLETT, Massachusetts; Clayton and SULZER, New York; LIVINGSTON and FLEMING, Georgia, and MONDELL, Wyoming.

Of these, BROMWELL, BINGHAM, LACEY, MOODY, Clayton, and SULZER spoke favoring the bill. Speaker HENDERSON appeared also to do so. The others opposed it.

Preceding the debate, on the demand for a second, the vote by tellers was 67 ayes to 34 noes. Following the debate, the vote on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, as announced by the Speaker, was 51 in the affirmative to 105 in the negative. And so it has gone into history. The yeas and nays were called for, but no roll call was permitted, though 25 arose in favor of same. This failure to get upon the record has ever been the result of all attempts to pass like legislation in the House. Of course, without the aid of Speaker HENDERSON the bill could not have been considered at all. Under the rules of the House, on the pending motion to suspend, no amendment of the bill was in order. Permitted to come up at an inopportune time, without proper notice, no previous opportunity to arrange and prepare for discussion of the bill was given. Your committee can not believe, from what happened on that occasion (as also on June 7, 1900, when the bill came before the House less than one hour before the adjournment of the first session), and a subsequent flat-footed refusal made by the Speaker to the pleas of the commander in chief and the chairman of your committee, on February 11, 1901, for another hearing of one hour on the measure, when it could be properly discussed and amended to meet the wishes of its friends, as also to test, on a roll call, who were real friends of the veteran and who his opponents, that there was a desire to treat either the bill or the veterans fairly.

IN THE SENATE.

The Senate Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service, having in charge the bill S. 283, offered by Mr. PLATT, at the first session (referred to in our last report), held no meeting during the second session of the Fifty-sixth Congress. Mr. ROSS, its chairman, had meantime been retired from the Senate, Mr. DILLINGHAM taking his place there, and also as a member of that committee. Repeated urging for a meeting of it produced no effect, so on due consideration by your committee and other friends of the cause of the veteran, of the whole subject-matter, and especially the continued attitude of opposition of the Committee on Rules and of the House of Representatives, as stated by the Speaker, he saying, "It could not pass the House or Senate," and particularly with a view to remove any objections as to new legislation—one of the alleged causes for adverse action taken by the House—another bill, amendatory of section 1754, Revised Statutes United States, was drawn, and the same was introduced in the Senate by Hon. W. A. HARRIS, of Kansas, on January 7, 1901. It was known as S. 5417. This was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment of the Senate, and on January 15 it was reported by its authority by Mr. HARRIS, to the Senate, without amendment. That bill, as then offered and reported, reads as follows:

A bill to amend section 1754 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the preference in civil appointments of ex-Army and Navy officers.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1754 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 1754. Officers and enlisted men who served in the armies or Navy of the United States between April 12, 1861, and August 25, 1865, being honorably discharged therefrom, shall be preferred for appointment to and retention in civil offices and employments, as also for promotion therein: Provided, They are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices or employments."

SEC. 2. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The committee report accompanying it (No. 1867) was as follows:

AMENDING SECTION 1754, REVISED STATUTES.

January 15, 1901.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, submitted the following report (to accompany S. 5417):

The Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5417) to amend section 1754 of the Revised Statutes, have examined the same and report:

Section 1754 of the Revised Statutes of the United States reads as follows:

"SEC. 1754. Persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty shall be preferred for appointments to civil office, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices."

Construing this section, the Civil Service Commission rule as follows, on October 29, 1884:

Any applicant honorably discharged for such cause, i. e., by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty, who, as the result of an examination has been placed upon a register as eligible for appointment, should be certified in preference to any other person thereon not entitled to such preference examined for the same part of the service, even though such persons are graded higher. Without such priority in certification, it appears to be hardly practicable to give the preference in appointment, which it seems to be the object of the statute to secure. You are requested to act upon this view in making certifications.

The amendment embodied in the bill under consideration broadens the scope of this section of the law, which limits preference for appointment to persons discharged by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness.

A large number of soldiers and sailors who were wounded and who served for years after being wounded are excluded, and preference is given to those who saw but little service, in many cases. The lapse of years has enormously reduced the number of men who saw service from 1861 to 1865. But few are left now who could avail themselves of the privilege hereby extended, and it is the opinion of your committee that those who may now be able to pass the civil-service examination and get upon the eligible lists should be preferred for appointment without reference to disabilities which forced their discharge from the service.

In the second session of the Fifty-fifth Congress, Senate bill No. 3256 was passed giving this privilege. It was also favorably reported from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service of the House of Representatives with the following report:

The Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3256) in reference to the civil service and appointments thereunder, submit the following report:

In the matter of the appointment of persons to positions in the executive departments of the Government under existing law, soldiers and sailors who incurred disabilities in the service and who have taken the civil-service examination are to be preferred. Under the provisions of the bill herewith reported this preference will extend to and include all honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, or marines who served as such between April 1, 1861, and August 26, 1865, without reference to the disabilities they may have incurred in service. Under the present law the right of preference is based upon disabilities. Under the proposed bill the right of preference is based upon the service of the soldier who has served during the war and has an honorable discharge.

The present law has given rise to a great deal of dissatisfaction among ex-Union soldiers and sailors, for the reason that the man who may have served only one month or less, if during that service he incurred any disability, is given preference in the matter of employment by the Government over the soldier or sailor who may have served from the beginning until the close of the war, enduring all the hardships and privations incident to that service but incurring no permanent disabilities. The passage of this bill will not in any way affect the operation of the civil-service law, rules, or regulations with respect to examinations for appointment. Soldiers and sailors, under the provisions of this proposed law, who apply for positions will be required as now to pass the civil-service examination, the preference applying only in the selection of persons from the eligible list.

The proposed bill also applies to promotions as well as to appointments, and if passed will prevent the removal of any soldier or sailor except for good cause and upon charges and after a hearing.

Believing that the discrimination which the present law makes against the soldier or sailor who has an honorable record of service, but who was fortunate enough not to incur any permanent disability, is neither right nor just, your committee therefore recommend the passage of this bill.

Your committee therefore believe it is but justice to the few survivors of that great conflict to give them this privilege, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

On January 16, on the plea that the committee had not met and considered the bill, and that it was not understood by Mr. Wolcott, of Colorado, one of the committee who consented to its being reported to the Senate (the vote to report it was on a canvass of the members of the committee on the floor of the Senate, a majority agreeing thereto), a motion was made by Mr. LODGE, of Massachusetts, to recommit the bill to the committee.

It was so recommitted on January 17. This was regarded as a knock-out blow. Earnest work by the members of this committee and strong personal appeals in writing and by visitation made to the individual members of the Senate committee by the commander in chief and others effected a change, however. The committee did meet and consider it, and on February 14 the bill was again reported to the Senate with an amendment (shown in words struck through. J. W. K.) as follows:

A bill to amend section 1754 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the preference in civil appointments of ex Army and Navy officers.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1754 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 1754. Persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness, and officers and enlisted men who served in the armies or Navy of the United States between April 12, 1861, and August 25, 1865, being honorably discharged therefrom, shall be preferred for appointment to and retention in civil offices and employments, as also for promotion therein: Provided, They are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices or employments."

SEC. 2. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The committee's report (No. 2289) accompanying the amended bill was the same as the report first made (No. 1867), except that in the last paragraph of the former, after the words "and therefore recommend the passage of the bill," as they appear in report No. 1867, was added "as amended to read as follows:" (The text of the amended bill is as given above. J. W. K.)

An intended amendment by Mr. JONES of Arkansas (evidently inspired by Mr. Procter, of the Civil Service Commission, and the Civil Service Reform League, both which, by the way, should be engaged in better business than devoting their time in the effort to belittle the services of and prevent justice being done to war veterans as well as to create a wrong impression in the public mind through the public press regarding a preference in public service which all veterans do not receive, and for the reasons that such acts are unworthy of Americans, and their interference is unwarranted and uncalled for, and as well obnoxious to the sense of justice existing among the people at large, as we believe) was as follows:

[In the Senate of the United States. February 20, 1901. Ordered to be printed.]

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. JONES of Arkansas to the bill (S. 5417) to amend section 1754 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the preference in civil appointments of ex Army and Navy officers, viz: At the end of section 1 insert the following:

The preference herein provided for shall only be given where consistent with the maintenance of the apportionment of appointments among the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia, as required by the civil-service act of January 16, 1883; and nothing herein contained shall be construed to deprive any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia of its equal representation in such apportionment upon the basis of population as ascertained at the last preceding census.

In the open Senate numerous attempts were made by Mr. HARRIS to get consideration of the bill, but he was always met by an objection. Among the objectors shown in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD are Mr. KEAN and Mr. Wolcott. There were others.

Indeed, it seemed as though the bill was not properly labeled. All efforts to secure action on the subject beyond the report of the committee failed. The chairman of your committee finally appealed to Mr. FORAKER, of Ohio, to move the bill. He solicited him, as also Mr. HANNA, of Ohio, and Mr. SCOTT, of West Virginia, and many others, for reasons well known to them, to aid in having the Senate take action on the same, even if adverse to the bill, but all to no purpose. Objections continued being made to its consideration until the end. And so the bill died.

SOME WORDS OF THANKS.

From the beginning of the first to the ending of the second session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, of the Senators and Representatives, 447 in number, comprising it, there would need to be some straining of conscience to record as friends of the veterans of the civil war, from the view point of this committee—by their acts ye shall know them—any great number of them.

Worthy of special thanks for efforts made at the second session were W. A. HARRIS, in the Senate; JACOB H. BROMWELL, CHARLES B. LANDIS, B. T. Clayton, WILLIAM SULZER, and JAMES A. TAWNEY, in the House; and to these may be added those named elsewhere who spoke in favor of the bill while under consideration in the House.

This is a white, not a black list. In it the committee desire to include those who were true blue under all circumstances. Beyond that it does not care to go.

WHAT PRESIDENT M'KINLEY SAID.

The declaration of President McKinley in his second letter of acceptance, "Preference should be given to honorably discharged soldiers and sailors and their widows and orphans in respect to the public service" bespoke what we believe is in the hearts of the people. It was a fair index of their loyalty to our cause. And to them we should now appeal.

RETROSPECTIVE.

Looking back over the entire field of action, consideration being given only to the prominent factors in the contest, it may be stated here that at no time from the adjournment of the thirty-fourth national encampment, August 30, 1900, until the closing hours of the Fifty-sixth Congress, March 4, 1901, was there any relaxation or diminution of labor or sacrifice to secure proper legislation in way of simple justice.

The promulgation, through national and department headquarters, to the posts of our order, by direction of the national encampment, of the committee's adopted report, accompanied by circular No. 1, current series, from the commander in chief, for action by them, and which, by the way, received attention everywhere in our order (except in one department, where it appears that orders from superior headquarters were not in this instance recognized or obeyed), with the result that more than 2,000 posts are on record as having petitioned for the passage of the bill; and the transmittal of personal letters containing a copy of the report alluded to, to each Senator and Representative in Congress at his home address preceding the meeting of Congress in December, and visitations to many of them at Washington during the session in behalf of the desired legislation, are but two among the numerous efforts made.

With the earnest cooperation of Commander in Chief Leo Rassieur, Adjt. Gen. Frank M. Sterrett, Department Commanders George H. Slaybaugh and Israel W. Stone, of the Potomac, and the committee on veterans' rights of that department, Comrade H. A. Cobaugh, chairman, as also the aid of Comrades Daniel E. Sickles and George H. Patrick, all of which was willingly given, your committee feel that there has been no shortcoming in any direction on the part of the accredited representatives of the Grand Army of the Republic, to whom this work was committed in their efforts to do their full duty to the order and to its rank and file. And that responsibility for defeat rests elsewhere.

CONCLUSION.

We again repeat: "The agony and bloody sweat are over. Lip service has again been tried and found wanting. God help the veteran." His countrymen in Congress assembled have not helped him in this matter. Perhaps the people will instruct some of them in their duty. It only remains for your committee to regretfully acknowledge defeat and gracefully retire. In doing so, we have some suggestions to offer for the consideration of the encampment.

One of these is in the form of preambles and resolutions requesting the issuance of an Executive order by the President of the United States, on the subject of the veteran in the public service. This we ask may be adopted and a copy properly authenticated by the commander in chief and adjutant-general, at a time in the discretion of the commander in chief, be forwarded to the President for his consideration, and that copies of the same be furnished to the press.

The other is "An Address to the American People," by the Grand Army of the Republic, which we recommend may be adopted by the encampment, and that copies be furnished the press, with the request that the same may be published, copies being also sent to the commanders of all posts, urging that they will personally see the editors of their local papers and request of them its publication.

We also recommend that the Harris bill (S. 5417) be introduced in the Fifty-seventh Congress, and its enactment into law again be urged by a committee of our order, to be appointed by the incoming commander in chief. And, to the end that there shall be no question about such committee properly representing the Grand Army of the Republic, we further recommend that copies of this report, together with general orders announcing and naming the committee, may be sent to the members of the Fifty-seventh Congress in Senate and House, to their home address.

Respectfully submitted, in fraternity, charity, and loyalty.

ISAAC F. MACK, Ohio,
H. H. CUMINGS, Pennsylvania,
W. W. ELDRIDGE, Potomac,
Committee.

And this was approved and adopted. In compliance therewith, copies of the same were mailed, under direction of Commander in Chief Ell Torrance, to all members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives in the Fifty-seventh Congress. What followed this action appears in full on pages 597–599 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, of date January 13, 1902. It was a most remarkable attack on the representatives of the Grand Army of the Republic, who had been strictly performing a duty assigned them. And particulary distressing, because it came from men who were themselves veterans of the "great war," members of the grandest organization the world ever knew, and who should, in justice to the committee of the order, have informed themselves properly concerning the truth and the facts of the case.

Concerning the subject generally and the attack, the Ohio Soldier, published at Chillicothe, Ohio, under date February 19, 1902, contains among other things an article which, with its caption, reads in part as follows:

SOLDIERS' PREFERENCE LAWS—A COMPREHENSIVE STATEMENT ON THAT SUBJECT BY THE CHAIRMAN OF THE NATIONAL COMMITTEE.

There is no subject upon which politicians have more persistently misled the public, and with more success, than that of existing laws on preference of appointment for soldiers in public employment. The following communication from Gen. Jos. W. Kay, of Brooklyn, N. Y., chairman of the national G. A. R. committee on veterans' preference legislation, now and for a number of years past, is so comprehensive and so fortified with existing laws and civil-service rules that it should be cut out by comrades everywhere and carried under their hats for use in next fall's Congressional elections. He says:

"The article, 'Squaring the Circle,' in the Ohio Soldier of January 22, evidences and emphasizes a knowledge of the situation and of the subject of legislation for veterans in the public service—or rather the lack of any such legislation preferentially affecting the interests of the men who served and suffered until the end of their terms of enlistment or the close of the war for the Union, albeit wounded many times—that is refreshing. Particularly so in view of the seeming lack of knowledge prevailing in Congress—among our comrades there—on the same subject.

"* * * The report of a committee made at Cleveland to the national encampment, September last, fully covering the ground of the law and making it plain, tells the story."

* * * * * * *

In the House of Representatives, the pension appropriation bill being under consideration, on January 13, it would seem that Mr. GROSVENOR was discussing the Harris bill (S. 5417) of the Fifty-sixth Congress, which was before the Senate only, and to which, if he desired to aid his deserving comrades, he could take no exception, instead of the Bromwell bill (H. R. 5779), the effect of a clause therein being to excite his ire, which was then before the House and not the Senate. His argument caused the question to be so mixed as to excite remark. Perhaps he so intended it. The clause concerning the Spanish war men inserted by the House committee, that he took exception to, was not in the Harris bill in any form or at any time.

Mr. HEPBURN, in his remarks, had the correct bill (H. R. 5779) in mind, but still persisted, as in the Fifty-sixth Congress, in showing clearly an incorrect understanding of what the existing law on the subject of the veteran in the public service really is. * * *

He seemed also to be wrongly advised concerning the authority of the committee of the Grand Army of the Republic to advocate H. R. 5779, as reported by the committee of the House.

He said concerning this:

"* * * The bill as approved by the authorities of the Grand Army of the Republic did not contain that language. * * * No authority of the Grand Army of the Republic had ever asked for that bill. There was no committee authorized to approve of that bill. * * *"

Read and ponder.

That identical measure was the one passed upon by the National Encampment at Chicago, August 29-30, 1900, in open session. The report of its committee, in printed form, was in the hands of the delegates over night. The situation requiring such an amendment to be accepted by the Grand Army, to avoid a worse injustice, was fully known to every one of them. And, knowing it, by unanimous vote of the body, the report was sent to every post, through the 45 department headquarters, with a circular from the commander in chief requesting action. * * *

And that was the authority for action by them.

As a result nearly 2,000 posts petitioned Congress for the passage of that particular measure. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows in detail all this action to have been officially brought to the attention of the House.

As already pointed out, the national encampment met at Chicago, August 29-30, 1900.

In General Orders No. 2, headquarters Grand Army of the Republic, St. Louis, Mo., dated September 28, 1900, the commander in chief, Leo Rassieur, in again naming the committee, says:

"The following comrades, whose excellent work, as shown by their report to the encampment, entitles them to the thanks of our order, are reappointed a committee on legislation for veterans in the public service." * * *

And in his report to the national encampment at Cleveland, on the subject of veterans' preference legislation, the commander in chief, among other things, says:

"The committee of the House of Representatives to which the original bill of the Grand Army of the Republic was referred, deemed it proper, in view of the action of the Senate on this subject in placing the younger soldiers and sailors on a par with the older veterans by S. 283, as amended in the Senate committee and passed by that body, but recalled [from the House, J. W. K.], to include the soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the recent war with Spain and in the Philippines, and were honorably discharged, giving them a preference next in order after the veterans of the civil war. This amendment by the House committee and the situation necessitating it was duly submitted to the Thirty-fourth National Encampment in the report of the legislative committee and was, without opposition, acceded to as a further extension of the just principles involved in the original bill."

All these demonstrate beyond question that the committee did nothing except with full authority. While the committee can stand for any misrepresentation and abuse on that score, knowing its position to be impregnable, it may not remain silent as to the other matter whereby a wrong impression again goes abroad, and which, ever since the adoption of the civil service principle, affects the veterans who deserve and most need help and protection. This, I am sure, Comrade HEPBURN would not care, knowingly, to openly stand for and encourage. And yet Mr. HEPBURN is quoted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 13 as having said:

"* * * All gentlemen who are familiar with the facts will recognize this as the truth, that in the competitive examinations the soldier who is now given preference by law is required only to reach a standard of 65. If he reaches 65 in competition with a man not a soldier who may have reached 99 or 100, the name of the man with a rating of 65 must be sent up in response to a requisition."

What an injustice. It is not true. Based on a false premise, the statement is cruel. Mr. Hepburn must know that no preference whatever is now given—not an iota—to anyone who was not "honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in line of duty."

The assertion is again made, without fear of contradiction based on truth, that the Union soldier who may have served from April 12, 1861, to August 20, 1866, and, meantime, have been wounded twenty times, unless his discharge from service was given him for disability, and the discharge shows that fact, is not now, nor has he ever been, benefited one single point in a competitive examination under United States civil-service law, or otherwise. That is the situation to-day.

The soldier who served a month or less in the Army during the war for the Union or since its close, and has a discharge given him for disability, comes strictly within the provisions of section 1754, Revised Statutes United States. He is passed at 65 and given preference in certification over one who braved it through to the end of his enlistment, or the war, as the case may be, despite his disabilities and wounds, and who may have gained a grade of 99 or 100 per cent. The latter stands precisely on the same plane with other citizens in competitive examinations in so far as the National Government is concerned. As to the recommendatory statute, section 1755, which became a law on the same day, March 9, 1865, it is a dead letter, more honored in the breach than by observance.

Section 1754 of these statutes, intended at the time for the benefit of the Union soldier or sailor, has been operative since October 29, 1884, under the civil-service system, favoring to the extent of 45 per cent men who enlisted and served, and were discharged for causes therein mentioned, since the war for the Union ended.

The language of the act permits it to be so construed, and the principle, that service in war which caused great sacrifice demands recognition, underlying it is a correct one for adoption in this Republic. It is too closely limited, however, to permit the gratitude expressed in section 1755, passed on the same day, to signify anything whatever to the men who in a period of war serve and suffer, many of them from the beginning to the end of the same, and who, under the law as it stands, have not now and never had any consideration whatever shown to them.

Personally the committee had and have no quarrel with Mr. GROSVENOR or Mr. HEPBURN. The former, at the request of the committee, has introduced in this Congress, in the House, a bill (H. R. 248) which is practically the Harris bill (S. 5417) of the last Congress, and that is now pending in the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service. The same measure (S. 3310) was introduced in the Senate by Mr. FORAKER and is now pending in the Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service in that body.

We are all comrades and have no wish beyond "who best can serve and best agree" in our work for worthy men. Yet history must not be perverted. Truth is more potent than fiction; facts are realities. The utterances of public men on the floor of Congress intended for the American people should always be based on a desire to do even-handed justice. More than this latter the American soldier does not ask or seek. With less than that he will not be satisfied.

Fraternally, yours, for the Grand Army of the Republic Committee of 1900-1901,

JOS. W. KAY, Chairman.

The report of the "committee on legislation for veterans in the public service," made to the national encampment at Washington, D. C., in October last, was as follows:

To the Thirty-sixth National Encampment, Grand Army of the Republic, greeting:

COMRADES: The "committee on legislation for veterans in the public service," appointed by the commander in chief, in accord with action authorizing it by the council of administration, acting for the thirty-fifth national encampment, at Cleveland, Ohio, September 13, 1901, submit the following:

Having before us the reports of many like committees of our order, especially those of recent years, in which the principles contended for and the duty of comradeship concerning them were therein expressed and set forth, and well knowing the lack of results accomplished by appeals to Congress for legislation in the material interests of the veterans of the war who served out their terms of enlistment affecting the right of such to a preference for appointment, employment, and retention in the public service of the National Government, in harmony with the spirit of existing statute law, it is not necessary at this time to comment extensively on any shortcoming of the Fifty-seventh Congress at its first session, which it is our duty to report. The fact is there. We shall therefore recite our own experience in another effort to secure justice for comrades, and thus enable the placing of the responsibility for failure where it properly belongs.

At the request of your committee, represented by its chairman, who was thereby acting in entire harmony with the desire of the commander in chief, Hon. CHARLES H. GROSVENOR, of Ohio, in the House, on December 2, 1901, and Hon. JOSEPH B. FORAKER, of Ohio, in the Senate, on January 28, 1902, introduced bills known as H. R. 248 and S. 3310, respectively, both being similar in language, as follows:

A bill to amend section 1754 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the preference in civil appointments of ex Army and Navy officers.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1754 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 1754. Persons honorably discharged from the military and naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness, and officers and enlisted men who served in the Armies or Navy of the United States between April 12, 1861, and August 25, 1865, being honorably discharged therefrom, shall be preferred for appointment to and retention in civil offices and employments, as also for promotion therein: Provided, They are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices or employments."

SEC. 2. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

H. R. 248 was referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service of the House and S. 3310 to the Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service of the Senate.

Your committee met, pursuant to call, at the Ebbitt House, Washington, a quorum being present, February 18, 1902. Meantime other bills had been introduced in both Houses bearing on the same subject. Consideration of all these being had by your committee, it was decided to recommend and urge the passage of H. R. 248 and S. 3310 as introduced.

On February 19 your committee attended a meeting of the "Committee on Reform in the Civil Service" at the Capitol, arranged by Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT, its chairman, in which all the pending bills were discussed. Comrades Leo Rassieur, Joseph W. Kay, George H. Patrick, Thomas G. Sample, and Commander in Chief Ell Torrance spoke for the Grand Army of the Republic, favoring H. R. 248. Messrs. POU, SHALLENBERGER, ALLEN, BRISTOW, and Chairman GILLETT, of the House committee, also shared in the debate.

No report being made by the House committee on any of the pending bills, such a report not being likely, as the chairman of your committee was advised, and deferring to the objections stated by Representative HEPBURN in a speech in the House January 13, 1902, as to the promotion feature (see pp. 597-599, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD), your committee united over the signatures of all its members and those of the committee on legislation of the Department of the Potomac in a letter, a copy of which was furnished to Mr. HEPBURN, as follows:

BROOKLYN, N. Y., April 18, 1902.

Hon. CHARLES H. GROSVENOR, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND COMRADE: As the national "committee on legislation for veterans in the public service" of the Grand Army of the Republic, appointed by General Orders, No. 3, C. S., a copy of which is inclosed, we hand you the text of a bill to amend section 1754 of the Revised Statutes, which is given below, and ask you to use your best efforts to secure its passage at the present session of Congress. The statute referred to now reads:

"SEC. 1754. Persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in line of duty shall be preferred for appointments to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices."

The proposed bill would, if enacted into law, cause this statute to read:

"SEC. 1754. Persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness, and officers and enlisted men who served in the armies or navies of the United States between April 12, 1861, and August 25, 1865, being honorably discharged therefrom, shall be preferred for appointment to and retention in civil offices and employments, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices or employments.

"SEC. 2. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

The lines italicized above are amendatory, and the remainder of the bill is the present law.

The bill now submitted is an exact copy of the bill heretofore, to wit, H. R. 248, introduced by you December 2, 1901, except making a slight correction in the title and striking out the words "as also for promotion therein," which, to avoid objection, we ask you to have omitted.

From the proposed bill has been eliminated every word or phrase to which we ever have heard any objection, in or out of Congress, and we believe that it will receive the concurrence of the House. On behalf of the Grand Army of the Republic we unanimously indorse and express our satisfaction with the terms and conditions of the bill, which have been revised after consultation with Colonel HEPBURN, of Iowa, and yourself, as well as others.

It will be observed that every person entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this measure by reason of the amendment must have been honorably discharged from the Army or Navy prior to August 25, 1865, and at the date of his appointment be able to discharge the duties of his prospective office or employment. In addition, where a prescribed examination for public employees is required, he must pass the same and be duly certified by the Civil Service Commission to be eligible for appointment.

Very truly and fraternally, yours,

JOS. W. KAY,
Past Department Commander New York, G. A. R., Chairman,
LEO RASSIEUR,
Past Commander in Chief, G. A. R., St. Louis, Mo.,
JOHN P. S. GOBIN,
Past Commander in Chief, G. A. R., Lebanon, Pa.,
HENRY A. CASTLE,
Past Department Commander Minnesota, G. A. R., St. Paul, Minn.,
GEO. H. PATRICK,
Past Department Commander Alabama, G. A. R., Montgomery, Ala.,
O. H. COULTER,
Past Department Commander Kansas, G. A. R., Topeka, Kans.,
I. G. KIMBALL,
Senior Vice Department Commander Potomac, G. A. R., Washington, D. C.,
Committee on Legislation for Veterans in the Public Service,
Grand Army of the Republic.

The committee on legislation of the Department of the Potomac, G. A. R., respectfully concur in the above letter and proposed legislation.

I. G. Kimball, senior vice-commander, Department of the Potomac, G. A. R., chairman; Nathan Bickford, past department commander of the Potomac, G. A. R.; Thos. S. Hopkins, past department commander of the Potomac, G. A. R.; Robert Reyburn, M. D., of Post No. 1, Washington, D. C.; A. Hart, junior vice department commander Potomac, of Post No. 2, Washington, D. C.; L. P. Williams, past senior vice department commander Potomac, of Post No. 3, Washington, D. C.; Henry N. Copp, of Post No. 10, Washington, D. C.; Bernard T. Janney, past junior vice department commander Potomac, of Post No. 19, Washington, D. C.; Edwin J. Sweet, past judge-advocate, Department Potomac, of Post No. 20, Washington, D. C.; Lewis H. Douglass, of Post No. 21, Washington D. C.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 18, 1902.

Based upon that letter (prepared to meet the views of Messrs. HEPBURN and GROSVENOR at their suggestion) a new bill was introduced by Mr. GROSVENOR, April 29, 1902, and referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service. It is known as H. R. 14105. This was not reported to the House, nor was any other of similar nature, notwithstanding that Congress was in session from December 2, 1901, to July 1, 1902, and that the effort to secure some action was continued until the day and hour the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress was adjourned.

The Senate committee, April 26, 1902, reported S. 3310 to the Senate, with amendments, as follows:

[Omit the part in brackets and insert the part printed in italics.]

A bill to amend section 1754 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the preference in civil appointments of ex-Army and Navy officers.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1754 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 1754. Persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness, and officers and enlisted men who served in the Armies or Navy of the United States between April 12, 1861, and August 25, 1865, being honorably discharged therefrom, shall be preferred for appointment to and retention in civil offices and employments, as also for promotion therein [: Provided they], provided they are found to possess [the business capacity necessary] equal qualifications for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices or employments with other competitors from whom the selection is made."

SEC. 2. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

And the bill, as thus amended, is now on the Senate Calendar. Can this be the measure of the nation's gratitude expressed in section 1755, Revised Statutes, as the Senate committee seem to think? Certainly not. We ask for justice and are offered a stone. Should such a bill become law, then the statute (sec. 1754) signed by the martyred President, Abraham Lincoln, is repealed, and nothing is left. Even that little which was long since given to some is taken away. And the soldiers and sailors of the Republic, even the few who are now preferred ones, are to be its victims; while the injustice and ingratitude ever meted out to those honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of the end of their terms of enlistment are still to continue.

Thirty-seven years is too long to wait for justice to the Union soldier and sailor, especially when anxiety is now expressed concerning the people of Cuba, Porto Rico, and the far-away Philippines, aye, even those of China, lest the national honor, pledged to them, be not fully observed. Are the obligations of America to foreigners more sacred or binding than those due to the defenders of the nation?

We would remind the Congress that when the lamented President William McKinley wrote, "Preference should be given to honorably discharged soldiers and sailors and their widows and orphans in respect to the public service," he simply reechoed and emphasized the sentiment emblazoned on a banner which stretched across Fifteenth street from the Treasury building, Washington, at the time of the final grand review, in May, 1865, and which proclaimed, "There is one debt this nation can never repay—the one it owes its defenders," or words to like effect.

And that, entirely in harmony with the foregoing, a recent convention at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., squaring by performance the constitutional provision adopted by the people of the State in 1894 for the preference of veterans in the civil service, declares:

"We believe that the devotion of those who took part in the great struggles of our country should be fully recognized, and we promise our support to such amendment to existing laws according to them recognition as may be deemed necessary in the furtherance of this resolution."

In strong contrast with no result of all appeals to the Congress was that action of the President, in direct answer to the request of the last national encampment, contained in resolutions emanating from your committee of last year, which appears in the following:

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

The attention of the Departments is hereby called to the provisions of the laws giving preference to veterans in appointment and retention.

The President desires that whenever the needs of the service will justify it and the laws will permit, preference shall be given alike in appointment and retention to honorably discharged veterans of the civil war who are fit and qualified to perform the duties of the places which they seek or are filling.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, January 17, 1902.

It is considered well to state that Comrades John W. O'Brien, United States weigher, and A. Reiman, deputy collector of internal revenue, who were named in a preamble of the resolutions above referred to, and who had been unjustly and illegally removed in disregard of the provisions of chapter 287, laws of 1876, which reads in part, as follows:

"SEC. 3. * * * Provided that in making any reduction of force in any of the Executive Departments, the head of such department shall retain those persons who may be equally qualified who have been honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States and the widows and orphans of deceased soldiers and sailors," * * * have, through Hon. Leslie M. Shaw, Secretary of the Treasury, and Hon James S. Clarkson, surveyor of customs at New York, both been restored to their positions.

The President himself in some instances—notably so in the case of a comrade who was postmaster at Skaneateles, N. Y., who applied for, but was refused, reappointment by the Congressman of the district, and to which his attention was called by Comrade Maj. Gen. Daniel E. Sickles—ruled that the comrades concerned came within those intended by his Executive order, and directed their reappointment or restoration.

Recognizing in these and in many other acts and words showing his patriotism that President Roosevelt is in full sympathy with fair and just treatment being extended to our comrades of the "great war" who seek or are in public service under the National Government, in accord with both the letter and spirit of existing law, and in harmony, as we believe, with what is still in the hearts of the American people toward the survivors of that great struggle, your committee, through its chairman, thereby lending emphasis to H. R. 14105, wrote him as follows:

BROOKLYN, N. Y., May 10, 1902.

Mr. PRESIDENT: Annexed I take the liberty to hand you copies of sections 1753, 1754, and 1755 of the Revised Statutes, and H. R. 14105,[a] recently introduced by General GROSVENOR, to amend S. 1754.

As you know, the present law (S. 1754) prefers only those discharged for disability, and, technically, as to offices, but the latter word has been construed to include employments. The proposed amendment applies the preference to offices and employments and extends it to all capable, honorably discharged soldiers.

Section 1755 recommends all private employers of labor to prefer soldiers discharged for wounds, disease, and at expiration of terms of enlistment. The Government ought most willingly and voluntarily to do as much for "the boys" as it asks its citizens to do, and more, if possible. None of the veterans of the war of 1861-1865 will be here to annoy legislators many years longer, yet very many of them are quite capable of fair and even splendid work—and they need this work. Unless capable, the proposed amendment will not, and is not intended to, affect them.

For obvious reasons it is better and more generous, more "in grateful recognition of their services, sacrifices, and sufferings" (quoting from S. 1755), that the addition we desire should be made by statute than Executive order, and by the party in power. I am sure that a timely hint from you to Speaker HENDERSON and half a dozen members of the House whose names will occur to you would result in the prompt taking up and passage of H. R. 14105, as I am equally sure that the objects of this bill have your hearty approval. It has the cordial support of the Grand Army, which will be satisfied with its enactment and execution; in fact, the bill was introduced at the request of the order.

I earnestly ask you to adopt the above suggestion, or, in the event that Congress should not act, that you will consider the matter of issuing an Executive order or civil-service rule to the same effect.

This letter is the following up of a personal interview of some time ago, in which I more fully set forth the ideas herein embodied. With great respect, I am,

Very respectfully, yours,

JOS. W. KAY.

The PRESIDENT, Washington, D. C.

[Extracts from the Revised Statutes of the United States.]

S. 1753. The President is authorized to prescribe such regulations for the admission of persons into the civil service of the United States as may best promote the efficiency thereof, and ascertain the fitness of each candidate in respect to age, health, character, knowledge, and ability for the branch of the service into which he seeks to enter; and for this purpose he may employ suitable persons to conduct such inquiries, and may prescribe their duties and establish regulations for the conduct of persons who may receive appointments in the civil service.

S. 1754. Persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty shall be preferred for appointments to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices.

S. 1755. In grateful recognition of the services, sacrifices, and sufferings of persons honorably discharged from the military and naval service of the country, by reason of wounds, disease, or the expiration of terms of enlistment, it is respectfully recommended to bankers, merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, farmers, and persons engaged in industrial pursuits to give them the preference for appointments to remunerative situations and employment.

Act of March 3, 1865 (res. 27), sections 1 and 2, volume 13, page 571, Revised Statutes.

This brings the story up to date. In plain and concise form, with little in way of comment, your committee has endeavored to give some intelligent idea of its work. The heartburnings met with are passed over, the sacrifices entailed not considered. The contest we wage is for justice, based on principles which are greater than men. "Fraternity means something." We aimed to do our duty.

To Commander in Chief Ell Torrance, Adjt. Gens. Frank M. Sterrett and Silas H. Towler, Comrades Daniel E. Sickles, Henry S. Peck, S. C. James, Israel W. Stone, and B. F. Bingham (now department commander of the Potomac, formerly of this committee, but who resigned, being succeeded by Comrade Ivory G. Kimball), as also to the committee on legislation of the department of the Potomac, for advice, counsel, and other aid, willingly extended, the thanks of the committee and of this national encampment are due.

It only remains to offer such suggestions and make such recommendations as will enable the constituted authorities of our order to continue urging the justice of the cause of its rank and file. In view of all the premises herein stated or outlined, and of the fact that the Fifty-seventh Congress will reassemble at its second session in December, we therefore recommend and ask as follows:

First. That the "committee on legislation for veterans in the public service" be continued. That a similar committee to this be appointed by the incoming commander in chief, with instructions to urge upon the lawmakers of the nation at the coming session of Congress the enactment of H. R. 14105, as introduced, or some similar measure of legislation.

Second. That in the event of failure to secure a vote on the subject-matter and the adjournment of the Fifty-seventh Congress occurs without legislation thereupon, the commander in chief and said committee are fully authorized, directed, and charged to appeal to the President of the United States, in the name of the Grand Army of the Republic, for justice, and respectfully request and urge that he will exercise the power conferred upon him by section 1753, Revised Statutes, to the end that, by Executive order or otherwise, he will make effective throughout the civil service, in a practical way, as applied to the National Government, the recommendatory provisions of section 1755, Revised Statutes, and also insure that the requirements of all other laws affecting the rights of honorably discharged soldiers and sailors in matters of appointment, employment, and retention in the public service shall be carried out and observed.

Third. That this report with its recommendations be in all things approved and adopted as the sense of the Thirty-sixth National Encampment, Grand Army of the Republic, and that copies thereof be sent to the Senators and Representatives in Congress to their home addresses.

[a] The text of H. R. 14105 already appears in this report.

And the Washington Post, of date October 11, 1902, in its account of the proceedings of the thirty-sixth national encampment, then in session at that city, says:

HOUSE ATTACK RESENTED.

Immediately upon the acceptance of the legislative committee's report, the following resolution was introduced by Joseph W. Kay, of New York, and adopted as a reply to an attack made upon the committee on legislation in the House on February 19 last:

"Whereas the work of the committee on legislation for veterans in the public service of the Thirty-third and Thirty-fourth National Encampments and their reports thereto were fully in accord with authority conferred upon such committee, the same being approved and adopted, and

"Whereas in the House of Representatives on January 13, and also before the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service of that body on February 19, 1902, the authority of such committee was brought in question and its members accused of forgery and other wrongdoing in way of misrepresentation of the Grand Army of the Republic; and

"Whereas the general orders from national headquarters, and the journal of the Thirty-third, Thirty-fourth, and Thirty-fifth National Encampments, and as well the archives of our order at Philadelphia, refute any such charges of forgery, lack of authority, or any shortcoming on the parts of such committee: Therefore,

"Resolved, That this national encampment deems it a matter of duty and justice to its authorized representatives herein referred to to declare in this solemn form that said committee was fully justified in its action and fully authorized in the manner in which they represented the order, and that the Representatives in Congress who attacked their position on the occasions mentioned had no basis whatever for any such criticism; be it further

"Resolved, That we commend our representatives on such committee for their faithful discharge of the duties intrusted to them concerning legislation for veterans in the public service."

The foregoing fully placed the Grand Army on record concerning the whole business—and it could do no less except through stultification. It certainly disposed of any question of doubt concerning the authority of its committees.

In accordance with the requirements of the report proper, a copy of the same, with the following letter, was sent as therein required, addressed to every member of the Senate and of this House. In many cases the report has been sent several times:

HEADQUARTERS GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC,
OFFICE OF COMMANDER IN CHIEF, INDEPENDENCE HALL,
Philadelphia, November 22, 1902.

Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT, M. C.,
Chairman, etc., House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In the discharge of my duty I have the honor to send you herewith a copy of the report of the "committee on legislation for veterans in the public service," which was submitted to, and unanimously adopted by, the national encampment, Grand Army of the Republic, at its meeting in Washington, D. C., October 10 last. This report explains itself and is commended to your attention and consideration. Especially so the recommendations concerning action by the Congress. Your active assistance and support are earnestly asked to the end that legislation may follow on the lines indicated in the report at the coming session.

It is my pleasure to advise you, also, that in General Orders, No. 2, bearing even date herewith, the committee appointed by the commander in chief to represent the Grand Army of the Republic on the subject has been named and promulgated. Said committee is constituted as follows: Joseph W. Kay, New York; Isaac F. Mack, Ohio; Leo Rassieur, Missouri; J. P. S. Gobin, Pennsylvania; George H. Patrick, Alabama; O. H. Coulter, Kansas; Ivory G Kimball, Washington, D. C.

Very truly, yours,

THOS. J. STEWART,
Commander in Chief.

Duplicated to home address November 25, 1902.

Since then, from the convening of Congress at its second session until now, as I am advised, the guns have been thundering "along the whole line" for justice. Personally I know that the great department of New York, through its commander, Allan C. Bakewell, has been active. Doubtless my associates in this House from that State have heard from him, as I have, and the RECORD since February 21 shows that department after department have been moving in the same direction, all pleading for legislation which should long, long ago have been enacted by the Congress as a matter of national honor, and in the doing of which the payment of not a single dollar of appropriation is involved.

But not alone is national honor overlooked by us. Something that should be of equal moment to us all, personal political honor, is at stake. It has caused to be written and sent, hopeless that other appeals would receive consideration, two letters, which I will now read. In them is embodied a cry of anguish, the voice of despair, caused by our neglect. Truly the veterans who preserved our Union of States and saved free government upon the earth have reason to cry aloud.

WAR VETERANS AND SONS' ASSOCIATION,
Brooklyn, N. Y., February 28, 1903.

Hon. CHARLES DICK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

COMRADE: "A friend in need is a friend indeed." In such view I write you. Under date 25th I have letter from General GROSVENOR which is discouraging. His antipathy to civil service seems to control him in the matter of H. R. 14105. And so last evening I wrote him, inclosing a copy of my letter to GILLETT of date 14th in which are some intimations of what happened in Chicago and New York in the summer of 1900, based on which Major McKinley, in his letter of acceptance, used the language quoted in inclosed report. My object was to fully advise the General. In my letter to GILLETT he was referred to Mr. PAYNE, Mr. HANNA, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. Manley, and Mr. Cortelyou concerning how those words came to be written. And why? His answer, as usual, was "consideration of my letter would be given, but he did not think that he would be able to comply with my request for a meeting of his committee." Personal political honor is with some people stronger than that of a national character, and I suggested this in the letter referred to.

The conditions in the campaign of 1900, both as to the political situation and that of the national encampment, were altogether unsatisfactory. As to both the sky was overcast. A solution of all was found at a meeting at the Palmer House, Chicago, August 28, 1900, some 40 or more leading veterans, all of whom were past commanders in chief or department commanders, being present from States where the situation was the worst, the outlook most threatening. Sickles was asked to organize another whirlwind tour, as in 1896, but emphatically refused to volunteer to do any such thing. He did consent to act as chairman of that meeting, and appointed a committee of five to wait on some people in a representative capacity at the Auditorium, I being one of the five. The four others went to the national committee, stated the situation and what was wanted, which was agreed to, viz, a change in Commissioner of Pensions and the passage of the veteran bill then pending (BROMWELL'S), as also approval of a court of pension appeals bill, the latter wish being vetoed by the President later on, but confirmed as to the others, and at the encampment all opposition was stifled. Following that, the strongest organization ever perfected among veterans was brought to bear in every doubtful locality. You will recall this.

I called personally on Saturday morning, saw Mr. PAYNE, went over the ground with him and the others then there, and, losing my return ticket to New York, bought another, went directly to Washington, and on Labor Day saw the President, who congratulated me; and he then and there called for the draft of his letter of acceptance and changed it, at my suggestion, to read as it went to the people. And then, returning to New York, the other matters were taken up, and everywhere the fighting was forced until the close of the polls. In that campaign the Veterans' Patriotic League deserved and received the thanks of Mr. HANNA, Mr. Manley, and Mr. PAYNE, in letters to myself and others. In the name of Heaven, is the sense of honor lost entirely among Americans?

As chairman of the committee of the national encampment, Grand Army of the Republic, it not being in politics, I could not write to GILLETT, or GROSVENOR, or anybody else, as I now write you. As chairman of the executive committee of this association, which is political and local, and of the which you are an honorary member and comrade, I can and do write you. Satisfy yourself that I am right and then lend your aid to see that the promise made to the representatives of the veterans by another body having a representative capacity is carried out at this session. The time to talk and parley is gone, and the time for action is at hand. You are at liberty to use what is herein written as you may think best. Many of those named by me can be reached. Regarding Mr. GILLETT simply as a "foil" to again deceive the veterans of the nation, I will not again stand for such treatment of their cause. And, in order that I may not longer be a party to it, have resigned my membership and chairmanship on the Grand Army committee, and will go at this matter as a citizen, from another direction. A copy of my letter of resignation is sent herewith.

When I reflect that even the change in the Pension Commissioner was brought about only because the promise concerning it was made known to President Roosevelt, and he, holding it to be a matter of honor which might not be pushed aside, made the change, and under such circumstances no power on the earth could have saved Evans, it seems to me that political honor is not regarded at its value, or as having any, except in rare instances, and by few men. Among these I place President Roosevelt and Mr. PAYNE, The latter has "stood by the guns."

When I think that nearly three years have passed since the promise of 1900, and from thirty-eight to forty-two years since the promises of the people in the "great war" days to the men who saved the nation were made, all being dishonored though nonperformance, it seems to me that national honor and personal political honor, alike, must be at a low ebb. We need your help. We want the party in power to do our people justice, now. And more than that is not sought.

Assuring you of the fraternal regard for you of our entire membership, but having little for those who by duplicity, low cunning, and chicanery try to "fool all the people all the time," which has made necessary my action of resignation and such a letter as this to you, I am,

Fraternally and truly, yours,

JOS. W. KAY,
Chairman Executive Committee,
War Veterans' and Sons' Association.

HEADQUARTERS GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC,
OFFICE OF CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON LEGISLATION
FOR VETERANS IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE,
Brooklyn, N. Y., February 27, 1903.

THOMAS J. STEWART, Esq.,
Commander in Chief Grand Army of the Republic, Independence Hall, Philadelphia, Pa.

COMRADE: In line with the reservation made by me in accepting the chairmanship of the "committee on legislation for veterans in the public service" at the time of my appointment thereto, by you, I hereby surrender the charge and resign said chairmanship and also my membership on that committee, to take effect forthwith. I am constrained to take this action notwithstanding the active help you have rendered, and which has also been so generously extended to the committee in its work by many department encampments and department commanders in their appeals to Congress, and concerning which I am advised. This course is taken in order that I may be free to write, as in the letter a copy of which accompanies this, what my conscience dictates to me to say as a veteran of war and a citizen concerning the treatment meted out to my comrades of long ago, and which, having regard for my obligation as a comrade, acting for them in a representative capacity on such committee, I am not privileged, nor permitted, under our laws, to do.

Your active, earnest cooperation in the work of trying to secure legislation in aid of our rank and file has been unceasing. In this my associates on the committee and others herein referred to have rendered active help. To that end, also, my own efforts have been directed; but it all avails nothing. And so, having reached "the parting of the ways," my duty to principles greater than men and to the organization whose representative I have been entails upon me that I sever the connection which has been to me one of great sacrifice—lay down the "white man's burden" and cry "quits."

When a great organization such as ours can appeal to reason and for fair treatment to the veterans of the great war to those "who have ears and hear not" in the Congress of the nation for, lo, these many years, there comes a time when manhood rebels, conscience protests, and from another viewpoint and forum than that of the Grand Army of the Republic the subject of decent treatment of the soldiers and sailors of the Republic must be brought to attention.

Fraternally, yours,

JOS. W. KAY.

HEADQUARTERS GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC,
OFFICE OF ASSISTANT ADJUTANT-GENERAL,
Albany, N. Y., February 27, 1903.

Hon. WILLIAM SULZER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the pleasure to acknowledge receipt of your courteous letter of February 24, expressing yourself interested in H. R. 14105, amendatory of section 1754 of the Revised Statutes, concerning the preference of veterans, and I am directed by Department Commander Bakewell to express his appreciation of your attention. It will give him further cause for gratitude if you will have his request of the 21st instant mentioned in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a petition, and personally see the Speaker of the House, Gen. C. H. GROSVENOR, and Hon. F. H. GILLETT, chairman of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, in the interest of action being taken on the bill at this session. The Department Commander will be pleased to hear from you as to probable results.

Respectfully,

WILBUR F. BROWN,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I quite agree, as stated by the gentleman from New York, that there is no fair comparison between the services which the men who served in the civil war rendered and the services of those that were in the war with Spain, but the gentleman seems to misapprehend the ground upon which I base my objection to this bill.

My objection is that the way to reward the soldiers of any war is not by preference in the civil service, but it is by means of pensions. The civil service ought not to be injured under the guise of giving preference; and that, I think, is what this bill effects.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I suggest to the gentleman that when these men enlisted in the Spanish war they did not know how long it was to last or how terrible it would be; they demonstrated their patriotism and deserve great credit.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I do not mean to intimate that their patriotism was not equal to that of the men who went into the civil war——

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Certainly it was, and the probabilities of long duration of war looked very promising, they deserve great credit.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. But their services certainly were not equal if their patriotism was——

There is one other objection to this bill. Under the civil-service law at present the appointments are apportioned among the States; each State has a certain number. But if this bill should go through these preferences will entirely annihilate that apportionment by States. The soldier, no matter from what State he may come, will take precedence over everyone else——

A MEMBER. So he should.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. So that the States from which these old soldiers come will fill the civil list, and there will be no room for appointees from other States.

Mr. GRAHAM. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this bill provides for the soldiers of the Spanish-American war if they are disabled; it gives them a preference, the same as other soldiers, if they are disabled.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That is the present law.

Mr. GRAHAM. Not as to the soldiers of the Spanish-American war.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The present law does that; this bill leaves those soldiers just as they are under that law. The veterans of the Spanish war and the veterans of the civil war stand under the present law on exactly the same basis. But the next provision of this bill applies exclusively to soldiers of the civil war, and in no wise touches the soldiers of the Spanish war.

And while I admit that the services of the veteran of the Spanish war, so far as regards the spirit of patriotism which inspired them, do not fall below those of the veteran of the civil war, yet the soldiers of the Spanish war endured no such hardships and rendered no such services as those of the civil war.

Yet the logic is precisely the same. The only ground upon which this preference can be granted is that service in war entitles a man to preference in the matter of appointment—gives an equal preference to the one who served three days and the one who served three years.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I should like to ask the gentleman, what is the provision of the present law with reference to the examination that veterans have to take?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. There is no provision in the law about that; that is entirely a matter of administration and rule. The law does not touch that.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Does not the law authorize the Civil Service Commissioners to prescribe an examination that veterans of the civil war must undergo before they can enter the civil service?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That is entirely a matter of rule and regulation.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Now I ask the gentleman whether in his opinion these words of the bill do not modify that provision:

Provided, They are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices or employments.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Those words are in the present law, if I remember rightly. No; I am mistaken; they are not in the law.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Well, if there is a law authorizing an examination to be prescribed for these soldiers, will not this language in the present bill have the effect to modify that, so that really no examination could be prescribed?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I really do not think it will.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] has expired. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has six minutes remaining.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts, who proposed an amendment to this bill, has a wonderfully short sight or a fleeting memory of the men who are entitled to the gratitude of the country.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not yield to any gentleman in these six minutes. The gentleman from Massachusetts talks of the soldiers of the Spanish war who served in the United States or in the island of Cuba; he would exclude from the generosity of the Government all the men who went over to the Philippine Islands; who went to Pekin and planted our flag upon the battlements of the Celestial City.

He strikes out all those and then picks up the few whose services were rendered within the limits of the United States and Cuba. He leaves out the sailors. He leaves out the men who served in the Indian wars. He leaves out everybody except a few whom he happened to remember—the Santiago men. That shows how generous and widespread the generosity of the gentleman is.

The honorable chairman of the Committee on Civil Service Reform [Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts] says that to permit these few veterans to have this preference would damage seriously the civil service of the United States. The other gentleman proposes to extend the damage by taking in everybody else! That is the logic of the opposition to the passage of this bill.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Ohio now yield?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will not. Now, let us see whether this bill is in conformity with the great sentiment of the American people. It is bad, is it, to introduce into the civil service of the country rewards for military service? It is injurious to the Republic to do that?

Before the great war six of the American Presidents had been soldiers, and from Abraham Lincoln, inclusive, down to the present occupant of the Presidential chair but one man was ever elected by the American people to be President of the United States who had not been a soldier. [Applause.]

What do you say to that? That is the American sentiment that these gentlemen appeal against. Governors of States, Senators in Congress, Members of the House of Representatives on this floor, men in all the various civil offices of the country, have been chosen by the people because of a purpose to honor and reward for the services they have performed for the country in battle and in war.

And now comes a gentleman who says that it is against the spirit of the civilization of this age to confer civil honors upon a soldier! Is not that a strange argument? Gentlemen, here is a very small token of your esteem for the old soldiers of the war. Let us give it to them. I will undertake to say, to guarantee, that the civil service will be in no worse hands, although it can not be, than it is now. [Laughter and applause.]

Let us give those few men as they linger this side of the tomb this little expression of confidence and affection for them, and they will see to it that in the discharge of their duties as men taken from the civil lists of the country there will be exhibited the same patriotism, the same love of country that they exhibited when they made it possible for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] to stand here representing in part a great, glorious, and united country. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 172, nays 50, answered "present" 14, not voting 114; as follows:

So (two-thirds having voted to suspend the rules) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. MERCER with Mr. BANKHEAD.

Mr. BARNEY with Mr. ELLIOTT.

Mr. JOY with Mr. COCHRAN.

Mr. BABCOCK with Mr. MCRAE.

Mr. WANGER with Mr. ADAMSON.

For the vote:

Mr. JACKSON of Maryland with Mr. GRIGGS.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (S. R. 170) for the transfer of the authority, power, and jurisdiction conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury by the act "to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States" to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

EMILY LAWRENCE REED.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the Committee on Pensions from further consideration of the bill (S. 6702) granting an increase of pension to Emily Lawrence Reed, and to suspend the rules and pass the same.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Emily Lawrence Reed, widow of Walter Reed, late major and surgeon, United States Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of $125 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving, in special recognition of the eminent services of said Walter Reed in discovering the means of preventing as well as the cause and method of the transmission and propagation of yellow fever.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee demands a second. The gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. HAY, will take their places as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 36, noes 2.

So a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized in favor of the bill.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, it is hardly necessary for me to address the House upon this bill, because on yesterday evening when the bill relating to Major Gorgas, who was united with Major Reed in these discoveries in respect to yellow fever, was under discussion, I went rather fully into the subject and explained why that bill ought to pass. Dr. Reed was born in the State of Virginia.

During the war with Spain Major Reed was president of the board of medical officers to investigate and report on the prevalence of typhoid fever. He was strongly impressed with the idea that flies were a very considerable agency in spreading this disease. Major Reed's greatest achievement for science and humanity, however, was his contribution in respect to the cause, spread, and prevention of yellow fever.

I want to say that that achievement is computed to have saved more lives than were lost in the Spanish war and to have saved more money than was spent in that war. The Senate in passing the bill placed in it these words:

In special recognition of the eminent services of said Walter Reed in discovering the means of preventing as well as the cause and method of transmission and propagation of yellow fever.

I do not think it is necessary for me to proceed further.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to know whether the facts show that Major Reed's services in the Army were connected in any way with his death?

Mr. HAY. Major Reed died last fall of appendicitis, of which he had had several attacks, and in his ardent wish to further this discovery he neglected to take care of himself. He was serving in the Army and serving here as a medical officer at the time of his death.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HAY. Certainly. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Only for a question. There are a number of gentlemen on this side of the House who have bills of a private nature, not public bills, but local to their districts, who would like to obtain consideration for those bills. May I ask the gentleman from Virginia whether his side of the House proposes to consume time by demanding the yeas and nays upon this vote?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes.

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman from West Virginia in the first place that I have no control over the situation; and I will say to the gentleman in the next place that this is not a private bill, but a public bill to reward a man who has done eminent service to his country.

It is a bill recommended by the Secretary of War, by the President of the United States, and I am recognized here, I may say, because the Department of the Government in which this gentleman has served has insisted upon this pension being allowed to Mrs. Reed. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I am not opposed to the bill of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HAY. It is not my bill——

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I intend to vote for it. I only want to know whether the gentleman will ask his side of the House not to consume the time of the House and the time which could be given to other members of the House to get recognition for their bills that they wish to pass by asking his own side to desist from calling for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman from West Virginia that I am not asking my side to do that for this bill. I can not control the situation, and the gentleman knows it, and I would not control it if I could.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Then I understand the gentleman is willing to filibuster against a courtesy offered to himself.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The gentleman is mistaken if he understands that. The gentleman from Virginia is exercising his constitutional right.

Mr. HAY. I did not hear the last remark of the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia whether he will ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed without a roll call?

Mr. GRIGGS. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The request is not made.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, as I said a moment ago, this is not my bill. This gentleman was not my constituent. It is not my bill in any sense of the word. It is not a bill in which I am more interested than any other member on either side of the House ought to be interested, and I have simply been recognized for the purpose of presenting the bill to the House.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask my friend if he does not know that the calling of the yeas and nays and taking up the time on this bill will probably prevent the opening of two or three reservations that would furnish homes for ten, fifteen, or twenty thousand of our American people—a bill that is on the Calendar here?

Mr. HAY. I do not know that at all.

Mr. RUCKER. That bill could have been passed during the three-hour intermission that you took a little while ago.

Mr. HAY. That has nothing to do with this.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I should like to make a suggestion.

Mr. HAY. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I would suggest to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES] that he has the precedents of his party on this floor within the last week, precedents in abundance, to justify him in using his efforts with the Republican Rules Committee of the House.

And I will say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] that he had this entire session of Congress in which to pass the legislation which he now complains he has a lack of opportunity to pass in the closing hours of this session, and which he flaunts here in the face of this House, without sincerity, I believe, because he knows the legislation can not pass the Senate. The gentleman from West Virginia can ask the Rules Committee to pass the bills which he refers to en bloc.

Mr. LACEY. I know the gentleman does not want to misstate anything——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will not yield. Instead of occupying time in seeking to pass 25 bills which have a like situation on the Speaker's table, why does the gentleman not use his efforts with his own side and appeal to his own Committee on Rules, because he has the precedents established by them to guide him. Now I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LACEY. The matter has been hanging here for a long time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Do you mean soldier bills?

Mr. LACEY. No.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman is a soldier. With regard to these 25 soldier bills on the Speaker's table, let my friend ask the Committee on Rules to do in the soldier's case what they have done in other cases.

Mr. LACEY. I am talking about free homes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Free homes! You have had three or four months, and why have you neglected to pass it? That shows the emptiness of the pretense of obstructive tactics that is charged against the Democrats.

Mr. HAY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I want to occupy five minutes. This is a bill that it seems to me under other circumstances would pass by unanimous consent.

The record of Major Reed is a very extraordinary one. His contributions to science and to the cause of humanity are unequaled by those of any man of this later generation whose name I can now recall. I was not in a few moments ago when the bill was called, and I do not know whether the attention of the House has been directed to what General Wood has said with respect to the services of Major Reed, but whether it has or not, General Wood's statement will bear repetition. He says:

> I know of no other man on this side of the world who has done so much for humanity as Dr. Reed. His discovery results in the saving of more lives annually than were lost in the Cuban war, and saves the commercial interests of the world a greater financial loss each year than the cost of the Cuban war. He came to Cuba at a time when one-third of the officers of my staff died of yellow fever, and we were discouraged at the failure of our efforts to control the disease. In the months when the disease was ordinarily worse it was checked and driven from Habana.
> That was the first time in nearly two hundred years that the city had been rid of it. The value of his discovery can not be appreciated by persons who are not familiar with conditions in tropical countries. Hereafter it will never be possible for yellow fever to gain such headway that quarantine will exist from the mouth of the Potomac to the mouth of the Rio Grande. Future generations will appreciate fully the value of Dr. Reed's services. His was the originating, directing, and controlling mind in this work, and the others were assistants only.

Higher praise could not be awarded any man. And I say that if this Congress should expire without providing for the needy family of this man—who has made such contributions to the cause of science and to the relief of his fellows, not only now, but for the years to come, and who has not only saved to this country now, but who will save to it in the years to come, untold millions of money as well as untold suffering—this Congress would die in disgrace. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HAY. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL].

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, in regard to this bill, I wish to say that it was before the Committee on Pensions and very carefully considered. We had in the hearings before that committee some of the most prominent physicians in the United States.

The committee was satisfied that the proposition to pension the widow of Dr. Reed was a just proposition. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has alluded to the invaluable services that were rendered by Dr. Reed. He it was who began the investigation into the supposed cause of the spread of yellow fever by a particular species of mosquitoes.

He it was that first successfully demonstrated that the disease was carried or transmitted from a yellow-fever patient to a healthy person through this particular variety of mosquito, and he it was that first suggested and put into practical use the method of separating healthy persons from those diseased with yellow fever.

As a result of these precautions and of his discoveries in this line, yellow fever has been almost completely if not entirely eradicated from Habana. I am told that there has not been a single case of yellow fever in Habana during the last two years as the result of Dr. Reed's experiments and investigations.

The only fear and the only thought of the great majority of the Pension Committee was that $125 a month, while it is in excess of what is usually allowed to the widows of soldiers and sailors in the service of the United States, was belittling the invaluable services which had been rendered by Dr. Reed to place the amount so low. I think I speak the sentiment of nearly if not quite all of the Pension Committee, when I say that I hope the House will pass this bill.

Mr. STEELE. Was it not understood that another gentleman had a great deal to do with this investigation?

Mr. BROMWELL. No and yes. There had been investigations, there had been theories, and there had been suppositions that this disease was transmitted through some particular form of insect. It was thought at first that flies were transmitting the disease; others suggested mosquitoes.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HAY. I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I believe I have the time in opposition to the bill. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio if he was not through.

Mr. BROMWELL. I was merely going to add, that while others have suggested that this disease was transmitted through the medium of insects—some supposed flies and others mosquitoes to be the means of communication—Dr. Reed was the first man to practically demonstrate the fact that this disease was transmitted by mosquitoes to the exclusion of all other insects, and in addition thereto was carried by a particular variety of mosquito.

Mr. STEELE. We passed a bill, a special bill, last night for a gentleman by the name of Gorgas, an officer, and I understood from the speeches made at that time that Gorgas had quite as much to do with it as had Dr. Reed. I never understood it before, and I want now the information, if the gentleman has any, on that subject.

Mr. BROMWELL. The information I had from many physicians——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I demanded a second because I did not understand the bill, and did not know but that I might want to speak in opposition to it. I have no desire to use the time myself in opposition to this bill, but if any gentleman wants to speak in opposition to it, I think, in courtesy, I should yield to him.

Mr. LESSLER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia to yield to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia has not the floor. The gentleman from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, permit me to say that I am not angry at any Republican individually, and I am not angry at them "en bloc." [Laughter.] I desire to submit a few reasons why the Democrats have considered it their duty to engage in what the Republicans are pleased to term "filibustering."

Mr. STEELE. What do you call it? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLAYTON. If that adolescent specimen of personal pulchritude will contain himself a minute I will give the reason. Be good, lest you compel me to annihilate you with a rhetorical fanfaronade. [Laughter.] Now, will you be good, Mr. Dooley? [Laughter.] I am entirely in a good humor. I am not going to say anything, if I know it, to rub the hair the wrong way. God knows we have pelted and belted you Republicans enough for the last four or five days.

Your consciences are smarting now, and I am going to leave you to your conscience and the righteous indignation of your just countrymen. [Applause on the Democratic side and laughter and jeers on the Republican side.] Oh, yes; your horselaugh is like your horseplay; it will not fool the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we had a right to complain of the Republican party, of their conduct for the last six years, which has from time to time grown worse and more intolerable.

A MEMBER. It is too bad you did not have Bryan.

Mr. CLAYTON. Good gracious, there is another Dooley! [Laughter.] Sit down and be good and do not interrupt me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SHERMAN). The House will be in order and all gentlemen will be seated.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am sort of an old stager on the stump, and I am going to speak. If you little Willies want to interrupt me, sail in. You can not disconcert me. Now, sit down and be good and let me alone. I can not lick them "en bloc," but I can lick some individually. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that even under Reed the Republican party allowed the Democrats on all great political questions to have a record vote. Republican intolerance and tyranny has gone to that extent by geometrical or arithmetical progression, so that in this Congress you have denied us on every important political question, I may say on every important public question, a right to have a record vote which would show to the country how the Democrats stood on public questions and how you stood.

You have brought in your rule, compelled us to vote for your measures unamended or "en bloc," without giving us an opportunity to have a record vote upon an amendment, and in many instances without giving us an opportunity to offer any amendment. This tyranny has gone on from time to time until patience on this side of the House has ceased to be a virtue. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You have deprived us of every right except the constitutional right to have a roll call on the passage of any bill. We will continue to fight you by the just use of this power until you give us at least fair treatment. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Your tyranny culminated a few days ago in expelling, without proper consideration, a Democrat elected from a Democratic district to this House. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] substantially charged that when you committed that iniquity there was not a quorum present—not a quorum of men here. We knew that under the Reed rules you counted men who refrained from voting as present for the reason that no man has a right to be physically present and parliamentarily absent.

But neither "the Reed rules" nor any other rules ever went to the extent of holding that you could consider a man present who was not in the building at the time. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] charged the fact to be that a quorum was not physically present when you voted to unseat Butler. It was not here. Nineteen men who were not here were "considered" present. Those charges were made and thrown at you here on the floor.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania who made that ruling did not dispute the fact. Those who were present when the outrage was perpetrated did not deny it. But some four or five days after the occurrence of the outrage and the public charge was made on this floor, when you saw the just judgment of your countrymen condemning you, you come in here with a labored essay, written by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], and seek to falsify the record by amending it nunc pro tunc.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall not imitate, I trust, the bad manners of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. I shall not apply to you nor to him any epithets. I might say that some gentlemen of immense proportions are superabundant adipose tissue combined with hot air. [Laughter.] I might designate the gentleman from New York as vox et præterea nihil. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON (to Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee). Give me just a little more time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. LACEY. Why not ask unanimous consent that you be given time?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, do not let gentlemen on the other side make these interruptions in my time. I appeal to you to give me the time I am entitled to. Some time when I have plenty of time, when we are not limited, I will just walk down to the center with any of you and have a talking match to the finish. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I shall not imitate the gentleman from New York. I shall not quote from the newspaper that he quoted. I could do it; for a few months ago, that same newspaper, the Courier-Journal, was criticising your President, and calling him the "broncho buster." When the gentleman from New York publishes that editorial reflecting upon the Democrats, let him parallel it with that editorial which calls your President a "broncho buster," which ridiculed him, and said hard things about him that I would not say, and no other Democrat here would say.

Mr. Speaker, I have here an editorial from the Washington Post of last Sunday, which I read, in view of the statements made by the gentleman from New York:

THE BUTLER-WAGONER SCANDAL.

We think that nearly every honest and unbiased person will sympathize with the indignation of the House Democrats over the despotic, not to say brutal, manner in which the Republican majority have disregarded decency and justice in the case of the Butler-Wagoner contest.

These contests have always been more or less sorrowful and scandalous, and the Post has invariably protested against them, no matter what form they took. But in this instance every evil possibility has been brought into an unlovely prominence.

Mr. Butler was elected to the Fifty-seventh Congress from the Twelfth district of Missouri. He came to Washington with all the legal and proper credentials. And that should have been enough.

If his adversary had, or thought he had, legitimate grounds for a challenge, he should have submitted his case to the local courts, where all the facts were accessible and where credible witnesses were easily within reach. Instead of that he appealed to a partisan tribunal, 1,200 miles distant, and invoked not a competent and informed verdict, but the irresponsible tyranny of mere force.

The manner in which Mr. Butler's case has been robbed of all its claims to righteous consideration; the fact that he was unseated without a quorum and in defiance of the Constitution; the notorious circumstances of arrogance under which he was thrown out of court, denied a hearing, and dragged ignominiously at the chariot wheels of the conqueror—these things recall the days and practices of the Goths, the Vandals, and the Huns far more than they suggest the régime of modern civilization.

We take no special interest in Mr. Butler personally. In our philosophy his case constitutes merely an abstract proposition in morals. But the fact that he has been deprived of his rights without the smallest reference to law and honorable observance is a fact with which men, without regard to party feeling or alignment, may well concern themselves.

The House has been made to declare that he was defeated at the polls—not as the result of proof or of judicial and dispassionate inquiry, but by force of partisan rulings by the Chair, and in the absence of the quorum required for the legitimate disposal of such questions. That the Democratic minority resent this action with bitterness is quite intelligible. That they should let their resentment take the shape of indiscriminate obstruction is at least human. A flagrant wrong has been committed, and the Republicans can not reasonably object to a harvest of their own sowing and cultivation.

We find in this incident fresh corroboration of our claim that election contests should never be referred to Congress, where the tribunal is always partisan and conscienceless, but submitted to the local courts, where at least the material for a just decision is easily at hand.

We have had too many of these scandals, and this last seems to be the worst of all.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to discuss the merits of the pending pension bill, save to say that it will have my sincere support and that I trust it will pass the House without opposition. My purpose now, sir, in accepting the time courteously yielded to me by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] is to fix the responsibility for the elimination of the $2,000,000 appropriation in the sundry civil bill to purchase a site for a new post-office in the city of New York. I want the people who are most interested in this post-office matter to understand the situation here, and I believe when they do they will not blame the Representatives in Congress from the city of New York for the delays and the failures which thus far have attended the proposition.

Mr. Speaker, when the conferees' report on the sundry civil bill was before the House for approval a little while ago I endeavored to get a few minutes' time from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who controlled all the time, to briefly express my opinion and voice the sentiments of my constituents regarding the appropriation for the new post-office in the city of New York. I had been informed that the appropriation for $2,000,000 put in that bill at our request by the Senate would be held in the bill by the House conferees, and I only learned after the conferees had agreed that the appropriation of $2,000,000 to purchase the site in the city of New York for the new post-office building had been stricken out. The gentleman from Illinois declined to let me be heard then. He did not want the matter discussed, and I was denied the right to be heard. The gentleman from Illinois declined at that time to give me a moment's time, and I am compelled to avail myself of this opportunity to say briefly what I wish to say regarding this matter.

The city of New York, which I have the honor to represent in part on the floor of this House, is the richest city in the world, the most populous city on this continent, and the metropolis of our country. Every citizen in all our land has every reason to feel a just pride in the commercial greatness of the Empire City, and it seems to be a remarkable fact and a most humiliating condition of affairs here that no matter what the great city of New York wants or how badly something there is needed, it can have no relief, it can get no aid from the Congress of the United States. The greatest city in our country is and always has been studiously ignored by the National Legislature. The way we are treated here is an outrage, and I say it has got to stop.

For years, Mr. Speaker, the people of New York City have been making a determined, but a fruitless, effort to get a new post-office, and the Representatives of that city in this House, in season and out of season, month in and month out, have done everything in their power to secure the necessary legislation; but all in vain. We have pleaded and begged and appealed, but without avail. Congress seems to be deaf to the supplications of the first city in the land. The humblest hamlet in any State can get a Federal building or a magnificent post-office for the mere asking, but New York City can not have simple justice in a matter of the greatest urgency and necessity and that affects more or less every other part of our entire country and all the people. It is strange; but, then, there is a reason for it.

The present post-office building in the city of New York is a disgrace to the Federal Government. It is old, damp, worn-out, overcrowded, and dilapidated. It is totally unfit to properly transact its immense postal business. It was built many years ago, and its usefulness is now practically a thing of the past. New York City to-day is more in need of better post-office facilities than any other city in the United States. This old post-office building away down town is wholly inadequate, and has been so for years, to properly handle and distribute the vast amount of mail that comes in and goes out of the great metropolis. It is damp and dirty and dingy. It is cramped and clammy and unhealthy. The Government employees there, compelled to work underground, are daily endangering their health and risking their lives, and are so crowded for lack of space and necessary room that it is impossible to expedite the distribution of important mail matter; and this deplorable situation affects, I say, not only the people in the city of New York, but the people all over the country, because it is well known that New York City is our greatest postal distributer.

Mr. Speaker, the post-office of New York City pays the Government an immense revenue profit every year; more, I believe, than any other three cities in the land and more than many States of the Union. The net annual revenue from the New York City post-office is about $6,000,000, and increasing more and more every year. With these apparent facts staring us in the face, it is a shame, in my judgment, that for this reason or that excuse it has been absolutely impossible for the people of New York City, or their representatives in Congress, to get Congress to remedy the postal evils in New York City and give the people there a post-office that will reflect credit on the Federal Government and facilitate the distribution of the mails.

It is well known, Mr. Speaker, to those members familiar with this question that after several years of weary effort and arduous struggle we finally succeeded in getting the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of this House to pass a law merely appointing a commission composed of the Postmaster-General, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney-General to go to New York City and select a suitable site for the new post-office building. No appropriation to pay for the site was made in this law, because we were told such a proposition was unheard of and contrary to precedent, and that no appropriation was ever made by Congress until the site was selected, and that just so soon as the site was selected Congress would forthwith appropriate all necessary money to pay for the same and to begin the construction of the building.

That is all we could then do, and so we waited patiently for the commission to get to work and select the site. For some occult reason, inscrutable to the uninitiated, no doubt, the commission seemed to be dilatory, and for months did nothing. Some unknown, intangible, mysterious agency was at work to thwart the will of the people of the city of New York and prevent the commission from speedily selecting a proper site; but everything comes to an end and to those that wait, and just before this Congress was about to adjourn the commission sent to us what purported to be its report regarding the selection of the site. We could do nothing but wait, we were told over and over again, until the commission made its report. We were powerless. The report, however, came at last. It was sent here only a few days ago, after the sundry civil bill, which had to carry the appropriation, had passed the House of Representatives and was in the Senate. Was this by design? But, nevertheless, just so soon as the report came to Congress we went to work, and after much effort succeeded in getting the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate to consent to put in the bill in the Senate an appropriation for two millions to purchase the site and begin to do something.

Now, I want to say the site selected is not to the liking of the people of New York City. It is in the most out-of-the-way place, and was selected, I am told, to placate the Pennsylvania Railroad. But be that as it may, we got the appropriation on the bill in the Senate and began to look forward with some degree of expectancy to the beginning of the new post-office in our city that would reflect credit on the Government and be commensurate with the wealth, the population, and the commercial supremacy of our metropolis. But, alas, again we were doomed to sorrowful disappointment. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois and his colleagues from Indiana and Arkansas, composing the conference committee on the part of the House, who have not a city in their districts with a population as large as that contained in the smallest borough of New York City, did not think the time was quite at hand for the Government to pay for the site or to begin the building. The site might be changed, don't you know. And, again, it might not be suitable after all. But if it were to be the site finally, nothing could be done until the Pennsylvania Railroad got its tunnel into the city and the excavations made for its terminal. Besides this, Congress had appropriated enough money—over a billion and a half of dollars—and it was time enough anyway to consider this in the next Congress.

And then, again, New York City is too far away from the districts of these gentlemen for them to know much about this site or to care much about it, and they must go there and see for themselves. Perhaps they have never been to New York and want to go there semiofficially and find out a little about it, and learn for themselves if the people are so anxious and if there is an imperative need of a new post-office. Then, again, another railroad company was jealous of the influence of the Pennsylvania. It wanted a site, too, forsooth. It protested. And so the appropriation went out. We were powerless. We did all we could. Now, I am informed, Mr. Speaker, that some of the commissioners designated to select the site never saw the site finally agreed on. One of these commissioners, I am told, was never in the part of our city where the site is located. But, be this as it may, I care not, the important thing now that I wish to impress on this House and the people of New York City, is that the conferees on the part of this House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY], and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE], made a determined fight in conference to strike out this appropriation of $2,000,000, notwithstanding our pleading and protest, and then when they brought the conference report back into the House they refused to give a New York member the opportunity to say a single word in explanation.

Were they afraid to have this matter discussed in the open? Were they sensitive to criticism which they knew must follow their betrayal and inexplicable action? Or, were they being used merely as "cat's paws" of conflicting railroad interests, that would rather have no post-office at all in New York City, unless it can be placed where they desire? I want the people of New York City to understand that the reason this appropriation was stricken out, and the cause for the delay in getting the new post-office and better postal facilities, is the great railroad interests at stake, which have not yet been harmonized, and until their wishes are complied with the people must wait.

While the conflict of railroad interests has been going on "dust has been thrown in the eyes of the people," and everything has been done to retard this great public necessity, and I say now to the newspapers of New York City and to the people there, some of whom have wondered, no doubt, why their representatives were unable to get this appropriation for the new post-office, that we never will be able to get it until the conflicting railroad and other selfish and personal interests are satisfied and withdraw their opposition. This is the truth and all there is about it. While the conflict rages as to where the new post-office site shall be and which corporation will benefit the most by it, everything will remain at a practical standstill, and there will be in our city no new post-office. Let the great metropolitan newspapers look beneath the surface in this matter and they will have no difficulty in fixing the responsibility. I do not care to indulge in further criticism, although I could, or censure those who have stood in the way, although any man familiar with the circumstances involved in this long delay, who has witnessed the cunning and the chicanery of the agents here of selfish interests and the manipulations which have been going on for years regarding this very important matter, knows as much about it as I do, and I trust the press of

New York City will look into the matter a little deeper than they have heretofore and place the responsibility where it justly belongs.

Now, sir, I want to say again in conclusion in behalf of my colleagues of New York City that they are not responsible—they have done all in their power, no men could do more—but the sad truth is we are in a hopeless minority and impotent to legislate for our city except with the consent of the majority; and that majority—the Republicans—will do nothing for the Democratic city of New York, especially if it will conflict with the grasping greed of monopoly and the sordid interests of the railroads that want the new post-office site located at their terminals or not at all, and their agents here have apparently more influence with the Republican majority in Congress than the just demands of all the people of New York City and their representatives included.

Mr. HEPBURN rose.

Mr. SULZER. I can not yield. My time is nearly exhausted.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. SULZER. I am surprised at the gentleman making that point now——

Mr. HEPBURN. He must confine his remarks, under the rules of this House, to the discussion of the pending bill.

Mr. SULZER. Why did not the gentleman make that point a little while ago against the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Which rule?

Mr. HEPBURN. Rule XXVIII.

Mr. SULZER. And the gentleman from Iowa has been speaking in violation of the rule nearly all day. Mr. Speaker, this does not come out of my time, does it? But at all events I have said practically all I want to say now in regard to this matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired, so it will not be taken out of his time. [Laughter.] The gentleman's time had expired just as the gentleman from Iowa rose to a point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SULZER. I would like the Chair to inform me through the gentleman from Iowa why he did not make that same point of order against the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired. The Chair assumes that the gentleman from Iowa does not press the point.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would prefer to have a ruling on the point.

Mr. SULZER. It is too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is well known that in the discussion under suspension in the House the subject discussed can not extend beyond the bill itself which is then being considered. Whether the rule limits it to a discussion which would be literally in opposition or in favor of the bill may be another question, but at least the rule requires that the discussion shall be on the subject then before the House for consideration.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Virginia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has but two minutes remaining.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I yielded twelve and then five. That makes seventeen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And one minute to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is right. I yield the remaining time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MAYNARD].

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe, and I certainly hope it is not necessary for me to say a word in behalf of the bill to pension Dr. Reed's widow because of the very eminent service he has rendered, not simply because he was a surgeon in the Army of the United States or because of the service he performed to the United States and the United States Government, but to the world at large.

All of the scientists who appeared before the committee—and they were men of note in the scientific world—assured the members of that committee that there had been nothing since Dr. Jenner discovered vaccination for smallpox which had been of so much benefit to the human race.

Surgeon-General O'Reilly, of the United States Army, said before the committee that when the Spanish war broke out he expected to lose large numbers of men, owing to the prevalence of yellow fever.

He said that since Dr. Reed had made this discovery and performed these great services, he would no more fear sending a United States army to camp in Brazil or in any part of South America or in Cuba than he would to an encampment in the State of New York.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that a citizen of this country, even though he were not an officer of the Army or of the Navy, who had performed such distinguished services, not alone for this country, but for mankind in general, should receive at the hands of this Government a substantial recognition of those services. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I demand a division.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, we may as well have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 163, nays 25, answered "present" 27, not voting 135; as follows:

PENSIONS TO MEXICAN WAR SURVIVORS.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 3522) to increase the pensions of Mexican war survivors to $12 a month.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey moves to suspend the rules and pass a bill which will be reported by the Clerk.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, at the rate of $12 per month, all Mexican war survivors now on the roll, or who may hereafter be placed on the roll, under the acts of January 29, 1887, March 3, 1891, and February 5, 1897.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama objects. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LOUDENSLAGER] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] will take their places as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 1.

Accordingly, a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire any time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman does not desire recognition, I will now proceed.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I reserve my time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to speak in opposition to this bill, but to say a word of condolence to some of the members of this House; and as there are quite a number of them entitled to sympathy, I hope no one will make any point of order against me.

I speak, Mr. Speaker, for some of the members who have constantly and earnestly lent their efforts to the promotion of certain bills, of interest not only to their constituents, but frequently of interest to the country at large. These members have followed their bills through the committees, have obtained favorable reports, in many instances unanimous reports; have secured the favorable consideration of the Speaker and of those in authority in the House, and yet to-night they see their bills, of interest to them, and therefore of interest to the country, gradually approaching their final resting place.

Since the fateful day when the good city of St. Louis cast a bone of contention into this House, we have made very little progress in the consideration of bills under suspension of the rules. Gentlemen upon the other side have characterized the minority, and we upon this side have retaliated. If the country at large believes all that is said by each about the other, then the sovereign voters of this country evidently are very poorly represented in this great legislative body.

I shall say nothing about the contested-election case upon which so much eloquence has apparently been wasted, but I wish to say a word of sympathy for those members of the House who to-morrow will see consigned to their last resting place, with the Speaker of the House as chief undertaker and the Committee on Rules as pallbearers, their progeny upon which they have looked so fondly since the first Monday in December.

I can speak with a degree of sympathy in this matter, because I have been greatly interested in a bill which I believe is not only of importance to North Carolina, but of great importance to the country at large. I refer to the bill authorizing the construction of a light-house at Diamond Shoals, off Cape Hatteras, on the coast of North Carolina.

There is no more important bill which has been reported by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce than this bill. This is the most dangerous point upon either the Atlantic or the Pacific coasts. It has been appropriately termed the graveyard of the seas. Thousands of lives have been lost there and millions of dollars' worth of shipping and valuable cargoes have there found their destruction.

During all the history of our country this point has never been marked by any stable aid to navigation. While at other places light-houses have been constructed, yet at this point, up to 1897, not even a buoy had been placed there to remain for any length of time, on account of the severe storms which prevail. In 1889 Congress passed a bill appropriating $500,000 for the purpose of constructing a light-house on Outer Diamond Shoals, 8 miles out in the ocean.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMALL. I desire five minutes more.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. All right; I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes further.

Mr. SMALL. Under that appropriation the Light-House Board made a contract with certain contractors of Pittsburg, Messrs. Anderson & Barr, to construct a light station there at a price of $485,000. These contractors made an effort to do so, and spent $100,000 in the construction of a caisson and in other preparations for the purpose of erecting this light station, and before it was completed, in fact, in its early stages, a storm came and swept the works away, entailing a loss upon these contractors, I have understood, of more than $100,000.

From that time no effort was made by the Light-House Board to mark this place of such great importance to navigation until 1897, when the Light-House Board, under the authority of Congress, constructed two light-ships for the purpose of maintaining one there constantly. In August, 1899, the light-house, in a terrible storm, was carried away.

It was placed there again in October of the same year, and the light-ship was maintained there until last Monday week, when in the terrible storm that prevailed that light-ship was carried from her moorings; but, having motive power of her own, she gradually made her way into Hampton Roads and to the navy-yard at Norfolk. A light-ship does not answer the purpose, on account of the severe hurricanes which occasionally prevail there.

Therefore it is due the shipping and commercial interests of this country—indeed, the shipping of the world—that this most dangerous point upon our coast should be marked by some stable structure. This is a bill which has been considered by the Committee of Commerce of the Senate and passed that body. It was thoroughly and carefully considered by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. It proposes to give to a gentleman, a citizen of the State of Maine, by the name of Albert F. Eels, authority to construct a light-house there for the sum of $590,000.

The light-house, the construction of which is described in the bill, is to be 200 feet high. He is confident of his ability to make it a permanent structure. He is to operate it one year and then it is operated by the Light-House Board for the period of four years, and only at the end of the term of five years, providing it is in a firm, stable, and secure condition at the end of that term, and has received the approval of the Secretary of War, is he to receive one cent compensation for the investment which he has made.

It would seem that a bill of this character, where the Government has been so thoroughly protected, when the shipping and commercial interests of this country demand the construction of such a light, should receive the approval of Congress. What is the condition of the bill to-day, gentlemen of the House?

It at one time at least had the approval of the Speaker sufficiently to induce him to give it consideration; but it seems there is a gentleman in the House who, for good and sufficient reasons of his own, so far as I know, has seen fit to oppose it; and this bill, together with, I have no doubt, other equally meritorious bills which are pending and have favorable reports, has had no opportunity to be considered in this House.

I merely sought this opportunity at this late hour to give expression to my grievance, and to explain to you this bill, which to-morrow will receive its quietus and be put into its last resting place until next December. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS].

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to express my great gratification at the fact that this tardy justice is now about to be done to the veterans of the Mexican war. Since my service in Congress I have fought in season and out of season that these veterans might receive this small increase from $8 to $12 per month in recognition of their services. I am delighted to-night that the time has at last arrived when the members of this House are willing to grant this recognition to them.

Now, I want to explain, Mr. Speaker, in addition to what I have already said, why I interrupted the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] a few moments ago on a bill which has passed this House. The bill which the gentleman advocated gives a preference to "soldiers honorably discharged from the armies and navies of the United States between April 12, 1861, and August 25, 1865."

I would not under any circumstances oppose preference for any soldiers who fought for their country at any time, but I desired at that time to ask the gentleman from Ohio if he would yield me the time to ask unanimous consent to strike out from that bill these words: "From April 12, 1861, to August 25, 1865."

Not because I am opposed to giving preference to soldiers of the Union Army who fought between these two dates, but because I was and am in favor of giving recognition to every soldier who enlisted in our Army at any time from the war of the Revolution till the present day. [Applause.]

It comes with a bad grace from an American citizen to throw cold water upon the men who enlisted in the war between the United States and Spain. When a man enlists in the Army, he does not know what the service is to be. If it is to be a hard-fought war, he does not know it when he tenders his services to the country.

Simply because a war was hard fought and long drawn out is no reason that preference should be given to him over those who have enlisted, for what they knew not, but for the service and for their country. For that reason I arose and asked my friend from Ohio to permit me to interrupt him long enough to ask unanimous consent of the House to strike that out and give preference to all soldiers, from the beginning of the Government until to-day. That was my purpose, my only purpose. I now yield back the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Alabama.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey if he will now use some of his time.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has fifteen minutes.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Does the gentleman from Alabama wish to consume any more of his time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I expect to use the other five minutes.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SNODGRASS].

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to prolong this discussion. This matter of increasing the pension of the Mexican soldiers has long lain very near my heart. I have worked for it in season and out of season, ever since I have been a member of Congress. It is a matter of extreme gratification to me that in the expiring hours of this Congress this act of tardy and partial justice is about to be done them.

These old men, as I stated last night, are rapidly fading into their graves, but the glory they have achieved for this country will long survive them. They will not live long to enjoy the small benefits that are now extended to them, but it will come to them as a message of good cheer from the Fifty-seventh Congress and will be appreciated by them and all their friends, and I hope the bill will pass unanimously. [Applause.]

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I now yield one minute to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the chairman of this committee for having called up this bill for consideration of the House, even at this late date in this session. When I came to Congress, one of the first bills I had the honor to introduce was one for the relief of an old Mexican veteran.

I am glad a favorable report was made upon that bill, that it received favorable consideration by the Committee on Pensions, and that it went to the Senate with the approval of this House and became a law by passage in the Senate and by the signature of the President. He was a good example of these veterans, being between 70 or 80 years of age; these men who have been waiting all these years for the small pittance which they will receive by this bill and which they should have received long since and they ought to receive more.

I am glad this is a Senate bill, so that when it passes this House it will not have to go to the other end of the Capitol, but can go immediately to the President of the United States, and I trust it will receive there promptly his signature and go to the country as a message of good cheer to these old men for the services performed and which have been so lightly recognized.

The only criticism of the bill is that it does not include also the veterans of the Indian wars. They should receive like consideration at the hands of this House. They are all old, and many of them dependent, and should receive an increase of pension like this. But that can not be done now, and I am glad the old Mexican veterans get this increase. [Great applause.]

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, it happened unexpectedly while the House was discussing a pension bill that something was said on the subject of light-houses. I should not say anything now but for the fact that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], while not mentioning me by name, made a reference which he evidently intended for me.

It is true that I have opposed a bill before this House appropriating $590,000 for a light-house for the coast of North Carolina. In the brief space of five minutes it will be impossible to tell all the reasons, because such a discussion must largely be upon questions of a technical nature; but I shall have time to mention a few.

In the first place, the attention of this House will be attracted by the magnitude of this proposition. I am informed that $590,000 is far and away more than has ever been expended for any light-house in the United States. If we adopt such a measure, it is not best that we should take it up at midnight on the closing day of the session.

At the same time, it is very far from me to begrudge expense for the saving of human life; and the amount is not my principal objection. But this proposition is a very peculiar one. A contractor comes forward and says, "I will erect a light-house; it shall be maintained for five years, the last four years by the Government; it shall be equipped with lenses, etc., by the Government; and at the end of that time you shall pay me $590,000."

He does not file his plans; he does not tell what his foundation shall be in those treacherous sands at least 105 feet deep. He gives no assurance of any success in his enterprise. And what is more, why should he not tell the methods and construction contemplated, so that the work may be thrown open to competition, and anyone may bid upon it, as upon other Government work, thus giving a fair prospect that the work will be done in the best and most economical manner.

Next to this, we have the estimates of very excellent engineers, not only competent, but eminent, that this light-house can certainly be constructed in the best form for $300,000, and for $150,000 in another form. We have the expression of the Light-House Board against this project.

Now, it is not safe for us to hastily override the recommendation of the executive officers of the Government. They say that the place specified here is not the best place for a light, and that even if erected at great expense it might not serve the purpose of saving life and property.

They say that the putting up of a light-house there must be supplemented by an expensive breakwater to cost an additional $1,200,000. Instead of having that expensive construction, the service had better be performed by the location of another light-ship, as the wrecks occur to vessels coming in from the south rather than from the direction served by this light. Also, it is said that the structure would not afford sufficient room.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of anything that saves human life, that gives light and direction to the course of the mariner; but I am not in favor at this late hour of midnight, within the last twenty-four hours of the session, of passing on a great proposition of this kind, for the apparatus of a fog signal and light-house and necessary quarters, very expensive in its nature, against the recommendation, and I may almost say the protest, of the officials of the Government who have this matter in charge.

If they are not competent let us turn them out, but if they are competent to do this work and provide this service we should not ruthlessly disregard their recommendations.

Now, I will yield for the question which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] desired a short time ago to ask me. I know that I have very imperfectly covered the ground. There are many more arguments that could be offered.

Mr. SMALL. Does not the gentleman know that of this $590,000, $80,000 is for interest upon the investment of the contractor for the five years that he must wait for his money, $10,000——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BURTON. I concede that the interest for five years upon the proposed investment by this contractor would be something like $90,000. But the highest estimate on this work by the engineers of the Government is $300,000.

Mr. SMALL. But the Light-House Board agreed to $485,000 two years ago.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I would not desire to discuss this matter at all, but for the fact that a gentleman belonging to another committee has seen fit—as I think, meddlesomely—to interfere in the consideration of this bill; and I understand that he has been so potential as to prevent the Speaker of the House from giving this matter that consideration that he proposed to give it.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman up to this time has given no reason why this bill should not be considered. As a truth, this place where this light is to serve the mariner is the one dangerous place above all others upon all our extended coast.

This is the one place where engineering skill up to this time has failed—utterly failed after many and many trials—to make any headway at all against the storms, against the raging waters, in the direction of the establishment of a light-house.

The gentleman says that this measure does not meet with the approval of the Light-House Board. It is a commendation that it does not meet with the approval of those gentlemen. I am glad that it does not.

The gentleman says that the Light-House Board, whom he wants to follow, says that a light-house, when it is established on Diamond Shoals, must be protected by a breakwater that will cost a million dollars; and yet he complains of the expense of this proposition, which is but a little more than half that sum.

Mr. Speaker, there is not a dollar to be paid, not a cent of expenditure upon the part of the United States, under this bill, until this work is an accomplished fact and until it has stood there defying the elements for full five years, and those who know tell us that during that period of five years we may reasonably expect the presence of one, at least, of those terrific storms, those southwestern hurricanes, which test the strength and durability of works of this kind.

If this work stands for five years, if it meets the requirements of resistance against the raging elements in one of those southwestern hurricanes, it is there for all time, and that establishes the fact of its efficiency at the foundations, notwithstanding the criticisms of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. Speaker, this bill was considered by the committee whose duty it was to consider it, not by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. It was considered by the committee whose duty it was to give it careful attention.

For weeks they did give it attention. They did not ask the Light-House Board, because they had condemned it long ago. They had substantially said that it is impossible for the skill of man to raise at that point a structure which will withstand the storms of the ocean.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SULZER. My point of order is that the gentleman from Iowa is not talking to the bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. At least, Mr. Speaker, if he is not talking to the bill, he is talking common sense—something that the gentleman from New York does not always indulge in. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Alabama if he desires to consume any more of his time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to occupy any further the time of the House upon this question, but I will ask the indulgence of the members for a few moments more. I do not doubt the honesty of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] any more than I doubt his ability, but I believe the gentleman from Ohio only yesterday had his attention called to this bill, while I called the attention of the House to the fact that this bill was under consideration by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and its distinguished chairman since about the middle of December; and, while in the beginning they looked with disfavor upon this project, yet when they had considered it carefully they agreed unanimously to report in its favor.

The gentleman from Ohio says the Light-House Board makes objection to the point at which this light is to be located. Let me call to your attention what the Light-House Board said in 1888. At that time the Board said that it was satisfied that it is entirely practicable to erect a structure at or near the outer shoals, and in view of the dangerous character of the shoals off Cape Hatteras, of the great loss of life and property which occurs there annually, and of the urgent demands of commerce, the Light-House Board stated that it was of opinion that provision should be at once made for the establishment of a light and fog signal at or near the outer shoals off Cape Hatteras, North Carolina—the very point where it is proposed that this light-house shall be constructed.

We have here a report from the Coast and Geodetic Survey which says that at this point the depth of water has been comparatively stable since 1850; that there has been no change there. If the Light-House Board have changed their opinion, and I do not doubt the statement of the gentleman, I should like to know what has brought about that change of opinion as to the proper location of this light-house, because they said in 1888 that it was the proper place.

The gentleman speaks about the cost of the light at $590,000. If a light-house could be constructed there and could be maintained permanently, the matter of a hundred thousand dollars or a million dollars ought not to be considered by Congress, in view of the great benefits which would accrue to the commerce of this country and of the world. There was evidence before the committee that this light-house would actually cost $400,000. That was not an unfair estimate. Yet in 1888, when materials were cheaper than they are to-day, this very Light-House Board which is complaining at the excessive cost agreed to pay $485,000 to Pittsburg contractors.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. Is the gentleman not aware that the model of the light-house in 1888 was radically different from that suggested by the gentleman who is to undertake the task, according to the provisions of this bill?

Mr. SMALL. There was some difference in the plans, Mr. Speaker, but nevertheless——

Mr. BURTON. Is the gentleman not aware also that that is a sufficient difference to make a difference in the cost of construction of at least 40 per cent?

Mr. SMALL. I could not concede that.

Mr. BURTON. Is not the gentleman from North Carolina aware that one objection the Light-House Board has made to the plans presented by the present commission in the bill is that the size would not be sufficient; there would not be room for the machinery; that it would be impossible to operate a light-house there? Is the gentleman not aware that there would not be room enough for the fog signal?

Mr. SMALL. I will say that the bill provides that the accommodations shall be such as those provided at Minots Ledge light-house, off the coast of Massachusetts.

Mr. BURTON. Is the gentleman not aware that Minots Ledge light-house is altogether different in the accommodations required? Minots Ledge does not have a fog whistle, whereas on this it is intended to have one.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to take any time, and I only rise to say a word in regard to the pending bill, if the House will forgive me for a moment for diverting the attention of members from the light-house, which is not a proposition now pending.

I speak in reference to the Mexican war pension bill simply because I learned to reverence the Mexican war veterans, for the reason that my father was one of those veterans. He is still living. Having for a number of years drawn a pension as a Mexican war veteran at the rate of $8 per month, not long ago, through old age, his pension was increased to $12 a month as a veteran of the civil war.

In behalf of his compatriots in the Mexican war, speaking a word as he would speak it for the men who served with him in the Mexican war, I am glad and proud that we are now prepared to confer upon those old gentlemen who braved their lives when they were youths in the service of the Government this slight tribute to their worth and their need. [Applause.]

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, we have listened to some discussion on the light-house question, which may have given to the members of this House some light upon that matter, but very little light upon the question under consideration by the House.

This is a service pension bill for the soldiers of the Mexican war, increasing that pension from $8 a month to $12 a month.

The annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions on June 30, 1901, showed that there were about 3,900 of those men drawing $8 a month, who were maintained upon the pension roll. The report of June 30, 1902, showed that there were about 3,400, or that there had been a loss of more than 10 per cent in one year; and I presume at this time there not more than 3,000 of these survivors of that war who will receive benefit by virtue of this bill.

In May of this year fifty-five years will have elapsed since the close of the Mexican war, and there is no doubt but that the average age of those who now survive will be beyond seventy-five years, so that the benefit conferred upon them will be of but short duration. The average amount to be paid in the first year is about $150,000, and I believe that there is no one here upon either side of this Chamber who is unwilling at this time to vote that this benefit be given to those soldiers. I ask that a vote be taken upon this bill.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama objects. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question being taken, Mr. UNDERWOOD demanded a division.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 192, nays 0, answered "present" 16, not voting 142; as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 3420. An act granting a pension to Anna O. Brush.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17288) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17493) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the following conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen from Illinois calls up the conference report on the naval appropriation bill, which the Clerk will read.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the report, and call for the reading of the statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the reading of the report may be omitted and the statement only be read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will read the report and the statement.

The report of the committee of conference was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17288) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 23, 24, 31, 33, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 42, 44, 45, 47, 54, 55, and 79.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 6, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, 20, 21, 25, 27, 28, 30, 32, 34, 43, 49, 51, 53, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 71, 72, 75, 76, 77, and 78, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 18: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$4,336,940;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 19: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following: "and no part of the same shall hereafter be used for the purchase of land;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 22: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of said amendment, after the word "and," strike out the words "William L. Marcy," and insert in lieu thereof the words "the mayor;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 26: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of said amendment, after the words "sum of," strike out the word "five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "one;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 29: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 29, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$82,800;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 41: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$17,900;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 46: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 46, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$77,442.52;" and on page 53 of the bill, line 22, after the word "Academy," strike out the words "two hundred and sixty-nine thousand three hundred and ninety-seven dollars and thirty-four cents" and insert in lieu thereof the words "two hundred and seventy thousand three hundred and ninety-seven dollars and thirty-four cents" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 48: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 48, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter struck out by said amendment, insert the following: ": Provided further, That members of the Fifty-seventh Congress who will not be members of the Fifty-eighth Congress and in whose districts or States appointments have not been made or vacancies filled in the Fifty-seventh Congress may, immediately upon the passage of this act, make the additional appointments herein provided for;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 50: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 4 of said amendment strike out the word

"nine" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirteen;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 52: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 52, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That after January 1, 1904, all candidates for admission to the Naval Academy at the time of their examination must be between the ages of 16 and 20 years."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 70: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 70, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That for the purpose of further increasing the naval establishment of the United States the President is hereby authorized to have constructed, by contract or in navy-yards, as hereinafter provided, 3 first-class battle ships carrying the heaviest armor and most powerful ordnance for vessels of their class upon a trial displacement of not more than 16,000 tons, and to have the highest practicable speed and great radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $4,212,000 each; two first-class battle ships, carrying the heaviest armor and most powerful ordnance for vessels of their class, upon a trial displacement of not more than 13,000 tons, and to have the highest practicable speed and great radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $3,500,000 each; two steel ships, to be used in training landsmen and apprentices, to be propelled by sail, and to cost, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $370,000 each; one wooden brig, to be used for training landsmen and apprentices at stations, to be propelled by sail, and to cost, exclusive of armament; not exceeding $50,000.

"And the contract for the construction of each of said vessels shall be awarded by the Secretary of the Navy to the lowest best responsible bidder, having in view the best results and most expeditious delivery; and in the construction of all of said vessels the provisions of the act of August 3, 1886, entitled "An act to increase the naval establishment," as to materials for said vessels, their engines, boilers, and machinery, the contracts under which they are built, the notice of any proposals for the same, the plans, drawings, specifications therefor, and the method of executing said contracts shall be observed and followed, and, subject to the provisions of this act, all said vessels shall be built in compliance with the terms of said act, and in all their parts shall be of domestic machinery; and the steel material shall be of domestic manufacture, and of the quality and characteristics best adapted to the various purposes for which it may be used, in accordance with specifications approved by the Secretary of the Navy; and not more than two of the five battle ships provided for in this act shall be built by one contracting party: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy may build any or all of the vessels herein authorized in such navy-yards as he may designate, and shall build any of the vessels herein authorized in such navy-yards as he may designate, should it reasonably appear that the persons, firms, or corporations, or the agents thereof, bidding for the construction of any of said vessels, have entered into any combination, agreement, or understanding, the effect, object, or purpose of which is to deprive the Government of fair, open, and unrestricted competition in letting contracts for the construction of any of said vessels."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 73: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 73, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 69 of the bill, line 12, after the word "tested," strike out the word "before;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 74: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 74, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the language proposed to be inserted by said amendment, and also on page 69, lines 12 and 13 of the bill, strike out the words "August first, nineteen hundred and three;" and the Senate agree to the same.

GEORGE EDMUND FOSS,
ALSTON G. DAYTON,
F. C. TATE,
Managers on the part of the House.
EUGENE HALE,
GEO. C. PERKINS,
B. R. TILLMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

Statement of House conferees on H. R. 17288, making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17288) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report on each of the amendments of the Senate, viz:

On No. 1: Allows commutation of quarters for constructors and assistant naval constructors, but strikes out provision for allowances as provided for officers of the line, pay, and medical corps of correspondding rank.

On No. 2: Reduces the emergency fund from $40,000 to $25,000.

On Nos. 3, 4, and 5: Restores the appropriations for transportation, recruiting, and contingent items for enlisted men and apprentices as originally provided by the House.

On No. 6: Provides that the unexpended balance remaining in the Treasury on June 30, 1903, from the appropriations, ordnance, and ordnance stores, 1900 and 1901, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby reappropriated and made available during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, for expenditure in the fulfillment of contracts heretofore made and properly chargeable to said appropriation.

On No. 7: Strikes out the appropriation of $250,000 for depots for coal.

On No. 8: Strikes out the provision for power and heating plant, to be immediately available, at Boston Navy-Yard, $230,000.

On No. 9: Restores the House provision as to totals, which is simply clerical.

On No. 10: Strikes out the provision increasing the limit of cost for dry docks at Portsmouth and Boston.

On No. 11: Makes provision for continuance of construction at the navy-yard, Charleston, S. C., and for two new buildings, a machine shop and power house, in all $300,000, and provides for the reconveying of a small triangular piece of land, about one-thirtieth of an acre, not needed for the navy-yard, to the city of Charleston at the same rate per acre as that at which it was purchased by the United States.

On No. 12: Strikes out provision for plumber and sheet-metalworker's shop, $75,000, for Norfolk Navy-Yard, as proposed by the Senate.

On No. 13: Restores the House provision as to totals, which is a clerical computation.

On No. 14: Increases the appropriations at navy-yard, Mare Island, Cal. $138,000, for buildings, etc., and provides that the balances from any appropriations for dredging be reappropriated for "Dredging or other means of deepening the channel in Mare Island Strait."

On No. 15: Provides for building for bureau of equipment, $120,000, at navy-yard, Pensacola.

On No. 16: Provides for an ice-making plant, $5,000, at Tutuila.

On No. 17: Changes the totals accordingly.

On No. 18: Changes the totals, in all, public works, in accordance with provisions heretofore made.

On No. 19: Provides that no portion of the $10,000,000 for reconstruction of the buildings, etc., at the Naval Academy shall be used hereafter for the purchase of land.

On No. 20: Provides that the Secretary of the Navy may limit estimates of cost for all buildings and improvements, including the hospital and dredging at the Naval Academy, authorized in the act approved July 1, 1902, as he may see fit.

On No. 21: Provides that $60,000 for additional temporary quarters and recitation rooms, etc., at the Naval Academy may be immediately available.

On No. 22: That the Secretary of the Navy, the Superintendent of the Naval Academy, and the mayor of Annapolis, Md., are hereby appointed a commission to ascertain the sites of, and to have erected suitable tablets upon, the historic places within the grounds of the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, Md., and the sum of $500 is hereby appropriated for such purpose.

On Nos. 23 and 24: Strikes out authorization for a design for monuments to be erected in the Vicksburg National Military Park and also for monument in the Arlington Cemetery.

On No. 25: Makes a change in totals, which is a clerical computation.

On No. 26: Reduces the amount of the appropriation for the expenses of a board of naval officers to examine site or sites for a naval magazine on the New England coast from $5,000 to $1,000.

On No. 27: Strikes out provision for sulphuric acid plant at Indian Head.

On No. 28: Changes totals in accordance therewith.

On No. 29: Changes the totals in accordance with provisions heretofore made.

On No. 30: Provides for a naval hospital, District of Columbia, at a cost of $125,000.

On No. 31: Strikes out appropriation of $100,000 for the enlargement of the general hospital at Fort Bayard, N. Mex., as proposed by the Senate.

On No. 32: Increases the appropriation for provisions, etc., for enlisted men from $3,500,000 to $4,000,000.

On No. 33: Strikes out the provision for reappropriation of $500,000 to the naval supply fund.

On No. 34: Appropriates $1,000,000 for purchase of clothing and small stores for issue to the naval service, the present fund being inadequate to meet the requirements of the service at this time, to be added to the "clothing and small-stores fund."

On Nos. 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, and 40: Strikes out provision for increasing the pay of clerks for Bureau of Steam Engineering.

On No. 41: Restores the House totals.

On No. 42: Strikes out the increase of the salary of certain professors at the Naval Academy and restores the House provision.

On No. 43: Provides for one assistant librarian at $1,000.

On Nos. 44 and 45: Strikes out provision for two clerks at the Nava Academy.

On No. 46: Changes totals in accordance with the above.

On No. 47: Strikes out five additional medical inspectors and restores House provision.

On No. 48: Provided further, That members of the Fifty-seventh Congress who will not be members of the Fifty-eighth Congress, and in whose districts or States appointments have not been made or vacancies filled in the Fifty-seventh Congress, may immediately upon the passage of this act make the additional appointments herein provided for.

On No. 49: Provides for the recommendation of midshipmen by the 1st of June instead of the 1st of May.

On No. 50: Provides that the increase of the appointments of midshipmen to the Naval Academy shall continue until the 30th day of June, 1913, instead of 1909, and thereafter one midshipman, as now provided by law, shall be appointed for each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress.

On No. 51: Provides for the appointment by the President of a midshipman from Porto Rico upon the recommendation of the governor of Porto Rico.

On No. 52: Provides that after January 1, 1904, all candidates for midshipmen to the Naval Academy at the time of examination must be between the ages of 16 and 20 years.

On No. 53: Reduces the House provision from ten years' service to seven years' service of commissioned officers in the Marine Corps selected for appointment to fill vacancies in the grade of field officers in any of the staff departments.

On Nos. 54 and 55: Strikes out provision for the grades of staff sergeant-major and staff quartermaster-sergeant for the Marine Corps, as proposed by the Senate.

On Nos. 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, and 69: Provides for increases in appropriations for the Marine Corps made necessary by the increased number of officers and enlisted men as heretofore provided.

On No. 70: Restores the House provision for the further increase of the Navy of 3 first-class battle ships with a trial displacement of 16,000 tons and 2 steel training ships and 1 wooden brig, and strikes out the 1 armored cruiser of 14,500 tons, and provides in lieu thereof 2 first-class battle ships of 13,000 tons trial displacement, and also restores the House provision giving the Secretary of the Navy authority to build ships in the navy-yards and making it mandatory upon him to so build in case there is combination on the part of contractors.

On Nos. 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78: Provides for the testing of subsurface boats with submarine boats by the Secretary of the Navy in his discretion without limitation as to time.

On No. 79: Strikes out the provision relating to the retired officers of the Navy ordered to active duty by which they shall get the benefit of active service.

The bill as passed by the Senate appropriated $82,512,312.43, being an increase of $3,172,892.28 over the amount carried as it was passed by the House. Of this sum the committee of conference recommended that $635,021 be stricken out and that $2,537,871.28 be agreed to.

The bill now carries $81,877,291.43.

GEORGE EDMUND FOSS,
ALSTON G. DAYTON,
F. C. TATE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to take up the time of the members of the House at this late hour in an exhaustive explanation of this conference report.

Mr. RIXEY. Will my friend allow me to ask if he proposes to give any time to anyone on this side who desires to speak to the report? We would like to have five minutes.

Mr. FOSS. As I understand the gentleman representing that side, no time is asked for.

Mr. RIXEY. Well, of course, I do not know what the gentleman representing this side stated, but several gentlemen do desire some time, and we would like to have five minutes.

Mr. FOSS. I would like to finish my statement, in the first place. Mr. Speaker, as I said, I do not care to enter into any lengthy statement in regard to the conference report. The statement signed by the conferees, two on this side and one on that, has been read, and sets forth very clearly and accurately what was done by the conferees.

I wish, however, to say this: This bill carries $81,877,000 in appropriations for the naval service. It is the largest naval appropriation bill, and I may say that I believe that it is the best naval appropriation bill, which has ever passed this body.

It provides for a liberal increase in the number of men; it provides also for an increase in the line officers and in staff officers, as recommended by the Secretary of the Navy; and it provides at the same time for a naval programme the like of which the American Congress has never before authorized. [Applause.]

The contention of the House conferees all along has been for the provision which was passed by the House authorizing the construction of three great battle ships of 16,000 tons. The Senate struck out that provision and substituted therefor battle ships of a smaller type, of about 12,000 tons.

The House conferees called before the Naval Committee after the Senate had put this amendment in the bill the chiefs of our great bureaus, who compose the board of construction of the Navy Department, and, after a very exhaustive hearing, came to the conclusion that they could not submit to the Senate amendment; that it would mean a backward step in the evolution and growth of the American Navy.

So they held out to that position until they finally brought the Senate conferees to write into this bill the old House provision for the three great battle ships of 16,000 tons each. [Applause.] We said that we believe in building up the American Navy; we believe in adding to the number of ships, but we wanted those ships to be the best ships in the world, ships that could meet the best ships of any foreign nation, and we stuck to that House provision until we won. [Applause.]

I may say that all along during the consideration of this bill the important contentions of the House conferees have finally been yielded to by the Senate. Consequently, it is a matter of pride that the House conferees bring in this report in the closing hours of this session of Congress.

It is a great bill. The Secretary of the Navy, who is making a magnificent record as an able and efficient public administrator, has already said that it was the greatest naval appropriation bill he ever knew, because it has been so liberal and generous in its features, providing this magnificent fleet of battle ships to bear aloft the flag of our country upon the seas and to defend the honor of our country whenever that honor shall be assailed. [Applause.]

I say to you here to-night that I believe that this splendid programme only meets the popular expectation of the American people from one end of the land to the other; because, if I judge the sentiment of the American people correctly, they are for a strong and efficient Navy—a Navy that will not only protect our commerce on the high seas, but protect us against the assaults of foreign nations, and at the same time will stand guard for that great Monroe doctrine which has been written into the history of our land. [Applause.]

Now, I do not care to indulge in a lengthy speech, so I will yield a few minutes of my time to my honored colleague on the committee who will not be with us in the next Congress, but who has given us the benefit of his great ability in the consideration of these mighty questions in the committee room and on the floor of this House. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLER].

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, if my friend and colleague, the chairman of our committee, had remained in conference a few hours longer, I do not know what kind of a speech he might have been able to make. But the condition of exhaustion in which he found himself compelled him to reach the lame and impotent conclusion when he made reference to me. [Laughter.]

I am sure that we are all glad that we have a chance, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate the conferees on the part of the House on the conclusion of their great labor, and especially that we have an opportunity to congratulate them and ourselves on the fact that they have brought in here a report embodying a bill which, in every essential feature, is the bill which this House adopted and passed a short time ago.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that wherever the American flag floats, wherever to-morrow the information will go, every American heart will beat with pride when it has learned that we are to go on in this great policy of building up our naval establishment. And our friends who live along the seaboard ought to understand that in the interior of this great and growing country there is as much pride in the development of our Navy as exists in any other part of our country. [Applause.]

We know that Congress will receive the support of that great heart of our people in the hope that it shall continue the good work that has been so splendidly developed. Now, when it is known that we are to build three of the most splendid and magnificent battle ships that we have ever constructed and two great battle ships only slightly less in magnitude, it will assure our people that everywhere our coast and our country will be protected, and the American citizen and flag will be everywhere defended. [Applause.]

And, Mr. Speaker, it will serve notice on the world that this country is willing to pay a large premium for the peace that it is determined to have and that it is bound to have, if it must fight for it. [Applause.]

But we find, Mr. Speaker, in this great development of our Navy, as I look at it, a reasonable assurance that not in our time, not for many years to come, will we have to "Cry 'Havoc,' and let slip the dogs of war." [Applause.]

Mr. FOSS. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. RIXEY. And that is the fairness of the gentleman who is the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs!

Mr. FOSS. The gentleman from Virginia does not mean that; I was about to yield him time.

Mr. RIXEY. That may be, but the gentleman was unfortunate, for I notified him that several gentlemen wanted to speak on this side in criticism of the report.

Mr. FOSS. I was not aware that any gentleman was going to criticise the report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. FOSS. On that, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 174, nays 19, answering "present" 20, not voting 137; as follows:

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. I call up the conference report upon the general deficiency bill.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17493) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 4, 5, 15, 17, 26, 33, 34, 40, 44, 50, 55, 94, 119, and 136.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 16, 18, 19, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 41, 42, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 51, 52, 53, 54, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, and 137, and agree to the same.

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 43: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 43, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment after the word "directed," in line 12, and insert in lieu of the matter stricken out the following: "to report the same to Congress for its action;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 68: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 68, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Salaries, Department of Justice: For the payment of the salary of the disbursing clerk from March 1 to June 30, 1903, inclusive, at the rate of $2,750 per year instead of the rate of $2,300, $150."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 135: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 135, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 43 of the amendment, in line 24, strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five;" and on page 43 of the amendment strike out line 25 and on page 44 strike out lines 1 and 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"For compensation, to be fixed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, of such special agents in the Bureau of Corporations, and for per diem, subject to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may prescribe, in lieu of subsistence, at a rate not exceeding $4 per day to each of said special agents, while absent from their homes on duty, and for actual necessary traveling expenses for said special agents, including necessary sleeping-car fares, $60,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

J. G. CANNON,
S. S. BARNEY,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

EUGENE HALE,
W. B. ALLISON,
H. M. TELLER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17493) making appropriations to supply deficiencies, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee as submitted in the accompanying report:

The Senate made 137 amendments to the bill, adding $6,659,961.39 to the amount thereof as it passed the House. Of this sum, the amount of $3,000,000 was to meet obligations imposed by the new public-buildings act, as a substitute for which the conference committee recommend specific appropriations for the new buildings, extension of limit of cost of buildings, and acquisition of new sites, in each case where the appropriation is necessary and in amount as the Treasury Department recommend.

These specific items aggregate $1,755,850.

The chief items inserted by the Senate, and which it is recommended that the Senate recede from, are as follows:

Payment to foreign cable companies, $117,507.34;

Payment to the Norwegian steamship Nicaragua, $4,926.67;

Payment to the Washington Market Company, $3,347.25;

Payments for injuries to private property by gun firing and mortar practice, $3,831.72;

Payment on account of British steamship Mogul, $16,123.70; the Secretary of War being directed to examine and report to Congress what amount, if any, should be paid on this account, and Payment to W. F. Palmer, jr., & Co., $83,620.59.

The amendment of the Senate providing for salaries and contingent and miscellaneous expenses for the Department of Commerce and Labor, modified so as to appropriate in the aggregate $301,000, is agreed to. The provision authorizing the transfer to this Department of $100,000 out of the $500,000 under the Department of Justice for enforcing the interstate-commerce and other acts, proposed by the Senate, is stricken from the bill.

The remaining sums added to the bill are chiefly to meet deficiencies in appropriations, for the payments of judgments of the courts, and audited accounts, ascertained and certified to Congress since the bill passed the House.

The bill as finally agreed upon appropriates $20,320,672.47, being $1,052,264.75 less than as it passed the Senate and $5,607,696.64 more than as it passed the House.

J. G. CANNON,
S. S. BARNEY,
L. T. LIVINGSTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, if the House will bear with me for a very short time, I will tell exactly how this agreement was arrived at.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CANNON. I do not yield to anybody.

Mr. CLAYTON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I should like to know if it will be in order, after the disposition of the pending bill, to move to go into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the Fowler bill. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I am in earnest, with a message to the House touching this bill. I ask the attention of this side; I ask the courtesy of the other side to allow me ten minutes without interruption.

Several MEMBERS. You shall have it.

Mr. CANNON. Gentlemen know that under the practice of the House and under the rules of the Senate the great money bills can contain nothing but appropriations in pursuance of existing law, unless by consent of both bodies. If any one of these bills contains legislation, it must be by unanimous consent of the two bodies; and the uniform practice has been, so far as I know, the invariable practice has been, with the exception of one amendment upon this bill, that when one body objected to legislation proposed by the other upon an appropriation bill, the body proposing the legislation has receded.

In this case the trouble in arriving at an agreement all clustered about one amendment. There were many amendments of a legislative character proposed by the Senate; there were many amendments, covering hundreds of thousands of dollars of claims, pure and simple, proposed by the Senate.

One by one the legislative provisions and the claims disappeared as the Senate receded, until we came to an amendment to pay the State of South Carolina $47,000. A word as to that. In May last, on the omnibus claims bill then passed, a basis was fixed for the adjustment of the accounts of Virginia and Baltimore and South Carolina with the United States, growing out of the war of 1812–1815.

The auditing officers of the Treasury, in pursuance of that law, adjusted the accounts of Virginia. An indefinite appropriation was made to pay the respective States whatever should be found due by the auditing officers. Upon that basis and under that legislation the sum of $100,000 in round numbers has been paid to the State of Virginia.

Under that same law, which is the law to-day, the auditing officers, in the adjustment of accounts, found due to the State of South Carolina the sum of 34 cents. Now, the Senate of the United States, notwithstanding the law to which I have referred, proposed legislation on an appropriation bill to the extent of granting to the State of South Carolina $47,000.

The House conferees objected, and the whole long delay has been over that one item. In the House of Representatives, without criticising either side or any individual member, we have rules, sometimes invoked by our Democratic friends and sometimes by ourselves—each responsible to the people after all said and done—by which a majority, right or wrong, mistaken or otherwise, can legislate.

In another body there are no such rules. In another body legislation is had by unanimous consent. In another body an individual member of that body can rise in his place and talk for one hour, two hours, ten hours, twelve hours. It is a matter of history that a Senator on the Republican side, in a former Congress, talked to death a river and harbor bill.

There comes a time constantly in the settling of bills when you must do so and so or so and so, else your bill can not pass, and this with reference to the great money bills. In my opinion, such a condition existed as to this bill and clustered about this one amendment. There was also an amendment put on the bill in that body involving legislation to the extent of granting to the State of Vermont $150,000 in adjustment of her war claims.

The Senate receded, but your conferees were unable to get the Senate to recede upon this gift from the Treasury, against the law, to the State of South Carolina. By unanimous consent another body legislates, and in the expiring hours of the session we are powerless without that unanimous consent. "Help me, Cassius, or I sink!"

Unanimous consent comes to the center of the Dome; unanimous consent comes through Statuary Hall and to the House doors and comes practically to the House. We can have no legislation without the approval of both bodies, and one body, in my opinion, can not legislate without unanimous consent. There was the alternative.

In my opinion this applied not only to the deficiency bill, but to the naval bill, an agreement as to the naval bill. Your conferees had the alternative of submitting to legislative blackmail at the demand, in my opinion, of one individual—I shall not say where—or of letting these great money bills fail. Now, what are we going to do about it? This bill contains many important matters—your appropriations for public buildings, legislation lately had all along the line of the public service to the extent of $20,000,000.

Now, I have taken the House into my confidence touching this matter, as it is my duty to do. I am getting to be a somewhat aged man. I pray God that my life may be spared until an intelligent and a righteous sentiment, North and South, East and West, pervading both of the great parties will lash anybody into obedience to the right of the majority to rule—and majorities and minorities shift back and forth.

Ah, says somebody, did that work in reference to the matter of statehood, and did you believe in statehood? I did not believe in statehood, and I am putting now the strongest case against my own party, but a majority of the people, voiced in the Senate and the House, had the right to have its will expressed.

Gentlemen, I have made my protest. I do it in sorrow and in humiliation, but there it is; and in my opinion another body under these methods must change its methods of procedure, or our body, backed up by the people, will compel that change, else this body, close to the people, shall become a mere tender, a mere bender of the pregnant hinges of the knee, to submit to what any one member of another body may demand of this body as a price for legislation. [Prolonged applause and cheers.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question being taken, Mr. UNDERWOOD demanded a division.

Mr. PAYNE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 179, nays 18, "answered present" 12, not voting 141; as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from North Dakota reports from the Committee on Claims a resolution and asks that it may be now considered. It will be read.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill S. 4497, entitled "A bill for the relief of the heirs of Mary Anderson," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1887; and the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17288) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17493) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3522) to increase the pension of Mexican war survivors to $12 per month.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 3522) to increase the pension of Mexican war survivors to $12 per month;

A bill (S. 6702) granting an increase of pension to Emily Lawrence Reed;

A bill (H. R. 3420) granting a pension to Anna O. Brush;

A bill (H. R. 5357) for the relief of William Leech;

A bill (H. R. 7659) to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to amend sections 5191 and 5192 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes."

A bill (H. R. 11340) for the relief of McClure & Willbanks;

A bill (H. R. 13075) to amend section 3 of the "Act further to prevent counterfeiting or manufacturing of dies, tools, or other implements used in manufacturing, etc.," approved February 10, 1891;

A bill (H. R. 15155) to refund the amount of duties paid on merchandise brought into the United States from Porto Rico between April 11, 1899, and May 1, 1900, and also on merchandise brought into the United States from the Philippine Islands between April 11, 1899, and March 8, 1902, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 15799) to confirm the name of Seward square for the space formed by the intersection of C street south and Pennsylvania and North Carolina avenues, District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 16881) to authorize the court of county commissioners of Geneva County, Ala., to construct a bridge across the Choctawhatchee River in Geneva County, Ala.;

A bill (H. R. 17288) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 17493) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

STATEMENT OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I desire at this stage to ask the Senate to insert in the RECORD and also to print as a document a history of the appropriations during the present Congress.

In this connection I also desire to have printed a comparison of the appropriations of the Fifty-seventh Congress with the appropriations of the preceding Congress, the Fifty-sixth.

It will be seen from this comparison that the appropriations for the present Congress are in excess of the appropriations of the preceding Congress $113,619,073.97, the total appropriations for the present Congress being $1,554,108,514.84, whilst the appropriations for the last Congress were in the aggregate $1.440,489,438.87.

This increase seems very large, and requires that a statement should be made somewhat in detail in order that the larger items of difference can be shown. This done, it will not be necessary to speak of the minor items of the comparison. There have been large increases of items of appropriation; in one item, at least, a large diminution of the appropriation for this Congress as compared with the Fifty-sixth Congress, namely, that for the Army.

The first and most important increase included in the statement for this Congress is an appropriation of $50,130,000 for the isthmian canal, which accounts for nearly one-half of the total increase.

There is also an increased appropriation for the Fifty-seventh

Congress over the Fifty-sixth of $53,377,221 for the postal service, but there was also a large increase in postal revenues, making this service more nearly self-sustaining than it has been for many years. The increase of revenue for 1901 over that for 1900 amounted to nearly $10,000,000, and for 1902 over 1901 more than ten millions, and though the increase for the present fiscal year must be partially estimated, it is believed that the increase will be more than twelve millions. Although we appropriated for the year 1902 $123,782,688.75 for the postal service, the amount paid out of the Treasury over and above the postal receipts was $2,490,635.34, the postal receipts being $121,848,047.26. During this time the efficiency of the service was increased in many ways, notably by a large expenditure for rural free delivery, and more largely increased during the years 1903 and 1904 by means of increased appropriations. This increase in the efficiency of the service has also resulted in increased receipts of the postal revenues.

These two items of the isthmian canal and the increase of appropriations for the postal service amount to $103,507,221, or within ten millions of the total increase of the Fifty-seventh Congress over the Fifty-sixth. There are other increases. It will also be remembered that in the Fifty-sixth Congress there was no river and harbor bill, and during the first session of the present Congress we appropriated $27,000,000, in round numbers, for rivers and harbors. In addition to that, there was carried an appropriation, made necessary by the execution of contracts for river and harbor improvements in the bill of last year, $5,700,000, and in the sundry civil bill of this year $20,000,000, making in all $52,700,000. During the Fifty-sixth Congress the total of like appropriations amounted to $23,300,000. This shows an increase of $30,000,000, in round numbers, for rivers and harbors for the Fifty-seventh Congress over the Fifty-sixth.

The naval appropriation bill, which was finally agreed to early this morning, provides for an appropriation of $81,877,291.43, and there was appropriated for the current year $78,856,363.13. These two appropriations show an increase of $17,490,947.56 over naval appropriations for the Fifty-sixth Congress.

The appropriations for public buildings in the Fifty-seventh Congress are in excess of those made in the Fifty-sixth Congress, in round numbers, $10,000,000, as few public buildings were provided for in the Fifty-sixth Congress as compared with the Fifty-seventh.

The exceptional appropriation this year for the Philippine Islands of $3,000,000 must be included as an important increase.

The only marked instance in the reduction of appropriations in the Fifty-seventh Congress as compared with the Fifty-sixth is found in the appropriations for the Army, which are $60,000,000 less.

There are increases in addition to those I have named of smaller amounts in the various bills, and there are also reductions in the various bills, but these will measurably balance each other, and it will be seen that the increased appropriations of the Fifty-seventh Congress are accounted for chiefly in the items I have named and are for the current necessities of the Government, and have received the approval of both Houses of Congress, and, in the main, of all parties in Congress.

I ask that these two tables may be printed in the RECORD, and also printed as a document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chairs hear no objection.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to ask him what was the deficiency this year in the postal service as compared with the previous year?

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator means last year?

Mr. BACON. Yes. The Senator states in the calculation he now makes that it is in the neighborhood of $2,000,000. I desire to compare that with the previous year.

Mr. ALLISON. I have not that data before me, but my recollection is that the deficiencies last year were in round numbers about $4,000,000. In other words, the deficiency this year is the smallest we have had for many years.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I desire to suggest to the Senate whether it would not be well to have the explanatory remarks of the Senator from Iowa printed also as a part of the document containing the tables. It seems to me that as explanatory of the tables it would be quite necessary to understand them, and I ask that his remarks may be included in the document.

Mr. ALLISON. They will appear in the RECORD, I suggest to the Senator, and that probably will suffice.

Mr. MCCUMBER. If the Senator has no objection, I would suggest that they also appear in the document.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no objection, of course, but it seems to me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the tables presented by the Senator from Iowa and his accompanying explanation be printed as a Senate document. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The tables are as follows:

Chronological history of appropriation bills, second session of the Fifty-seventh Congress; estimates and appropriations for the fiscal year 1903-4, and appropriations for the fiscal year 1902-3.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST PRODUCTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. LODGE. I ask to take from the table the resolution calling on the Committee on Finance to report to the Senate whether any, and if so, what, countries discriminate against any article the growth or product of the soil or industry of the United States, etc., and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Finance, in the absence of objection.

KIOWA INDIAN AGENCY.

Mr. STEWART. I present a paper, being a petition of the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indians in Oklahoma, praying that an investigation be made into the affairs of the Kiowa Indian Agency. I move that the petition and accompanying papers be printed as a document, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

CHANNEL IN SABINE LAKE, TEXAS.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17243) to amend "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved June 13, 1902.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has heretofore been read to the Senate.

Mr. MASON. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois objects.

Mr. BAILEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the "ayes" have it.

Mr. MASON. I am a member of the Committee on Commerce, but I did not happen to be present at the time the bill was reported.

Mr. HOAR. Did the Chair announce the result of the vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not announced it.

Mr. TELLER. Let us have the result announced.

Mr. HOAR. Then——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The "ayes" have it.

Mr. MASON. I had the floor. I am speaking upon that question.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to call——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Illinois is out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable. The "ayes" have it, and the bill is before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I rose to call for a division at once, as soon as I learned that the Chair had announced the vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is entitled to a division, if he asks for it. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill on which a division is called for.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair announce the subject of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be announced to the Senate.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 17243) to amend "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved June 13, 1902.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I confess that I do not know what the bill relates to, and I think it ought to be read.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. Or the Senator can make a statement.

Mr. BAILEY. With the Senator's consent——

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I will state that the last river and harbor act made a certain appropriation for a Texas improvement. When they came to apply that money the War Department found that there was a proviso which rendered it difficult to apply it as it was intended. The War Department recommend the passage of this bill. It has passed the House unanimously and has been recommended unanimously by the Committee on Commerce of this body. The whole purpose of it is to simply enable the War Department to use money that can not be advantageously used now.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator explains it so that I now understand it.

Mr. HOAR. I withdraw the call for a division and I suggest to the Senator to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. I did request unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill, and I renew the request.

Mr. MASON. I renew the call for a division. I desire to state that the bill changes very materially, as I understand it, a provisicn in the river and harbor act. I have been endeavoring to get some one to explain to me the reason or the necessity for the change.

Mr. BAILEY. I have just stated it to the Senate and in the presence of the Senator.

Mr. MASON. The Senator has stated it, but in general terms. My constituents who happen to be residing in that neighborhood and are interested have urged me to object to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. MASON. I say it is manifestly unfair to press the bill at this stage of the proceedings. Since I came into the Chamber I have asked for a communication with my constituents by telephone. I am told repeatedly that they do not understand the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator from Illinois will permit me, is it not true that three or four days ago when I made my request for unanimous consent, the Senator from Illinois then had before him the same information he now has?

Mr. MASON. And no more.

Mr. BAILEY. And no more. The Senator, however, sought to obtain more, and his constituents have not advised him.

Mr. MASON. I will say to the Senator that on two particular occasions I have asked for information from my constituents, and as I have been called on the long-distance telephone from New York, where my people temporarily are, I have no means of knowing but what they are the very ones who have made the call, and are trying to explain to me the prejudice which this bill will be to their interests.

Mr. BAILEY. I will tell the Senator——

Mr. MASON. To be perfectly frank—there is no need of having secrets about it—some of the people interested who have built the railroad, or own the railroad, are my constituents and live in Chicago. They have said that this change of the channel will greatly prejudice interests at Port Arthur.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Illinois permit me to state exactly what the change is, and then he can judge for himself?

Mr. MASON. I do not think I can judge for myself.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, Mr. President, let us have the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand; but I simply want to interrupt the Senator from Illinois long enough to say that under the law this channel which the War Department is authorized to build would be connected with the Port Arthur Channel, the private property of the railroad company, and the Port Arthur Channel Company refused to allow the Government to connect with this channel. Now, the Government simply proposes to go around the other way and to connect with another navigable stream.

How in the world it can be of any injury to that canal company for the Government now to connect with a navigable stream, after they have refused to allow it to connect with their canal, is beyond my comprehension. It may be that they desire to force some terms upon the Government for the connection with their canal; but surely private enterprise will not be permitted to stand here and defeat in such a manner a public work authorized by Congress.

Mr. MASON. The public work which has been authorized by Congress the Senator from Texas is now seeking to change.

Mr. BAILEY. It is still a public work.

Mr. MASON. It may be a public work, and yet may be wholly prejudicial to the property of the people who are interested in that locality. So far as I am concerned, I can see by the statement of the Senator from Texas that there is some difference of opinion as to whether the channel shall be constructed as the present river and harbor bill fixes it so that it goes directly by Port Arthur——

Mr. BAILEY. No; there is not. The present river and harbor bill simply provides that Port Arthur shall have a connection with the canal, and the people who own this canal refuse to allow the Government to connect. Then the Government can not prosecute this public work unless it is permitted to connect with another navigable stream. That is the whole proposition.

Mr. MASON. That is not the statement I received from the chairman of the committee of the other House. There is no disposition on his part, according to his statement, at any time to prevent a connection between these public improvements and the canal. I can not conceive how the people who own the canal could object to having any connection with this Government improvement.

Mr. BAILEY. They have done it; and since the Senator from Illinois seems to have had a conversation with the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the other House, I will ask him if the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House did not urge that this bill should be passed?

Mr. MASON. Certainly he did.

Mr. BAILEY. And it was unanimously reported?

Mr. MASON. I understand that. He came to me saying that he desired this change at the request of one of the members. There is no secret about it. I think this is a very serious change, and I should like to have the report from the War Department read now, so that the Senate may understand the situation of the matter.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I think we had better proceed in an orderly way, so as to see if the Senate desire to consider the bill. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that I have no disposition to consume the hour and twenty-five minutes remaining of the session in the consideration of this bill, and if the Senator thinks it is his duty to occupy the remainder of the time for the purpose of defeating the bill I am going to withdraw it. I am not willing to inconvenience Senators who have uncontested matters which they desire to have considered.

Mr. SPOONER. Is the bill the Senator desires to have considered a House bill?

Mr. BAILEY. It is a House bill, which has been considered by the committee and approved.

Mr. MASON. I do not know why the Senator intimates anything of the kind he has done. I have tried to set an example to Senators on both sides, and I have not been a member of any filibustering expedition.

Mr. BAILEY. I simply ask the Senator to let us see whether or not the Senate is going to consider the bill before any report is read or anything else is done.

Mr. MASON. I think myself, Mr. President, that if the matter can be delayed for ten or fifteen minutes, and the Senator will then call up the bill, I shall perhaps have more information regarding it.

Mr. BAILEY. I shall not be able to get this matter before the Senate again, and I demand the regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

Mr. MASON. I ask for a division, Mr. President.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 28, noes 13.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The want of a quorum has been developed, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll; and the following Senators answered to their names:

Alger,	Cullom,	Kean,	Platt, N. Y.
Allee,	Dietrich,	Kearns,	Proctor,
Allison,	Dillingham,	Kittredge,	Quarles,
Bacon,	Dryden,	Lodge,	Rawlins,
Bailey,	Fairbanks,	McCumber,	Simmons,
Ball,	Foraker,	McLaurin, Miss.	Simon,
Bard,	Foster, La.	Mallory,	Stewart,
Berry,	Foster, Wash.	Martin,	Taliaferro,
Blackburn,	Frye,	Mason,	Teller,
Burnham,	Gallinger,	Millard,	Tillman,
Burrows,	Gamble,	Mitchell,	Turner,
Burton,	Hanna,	Morgan,	Wellington,
Carmack,	Harris,	Nelson,	Wetmore.
Clark, Mont.	Heitfeld,	Patterson,
Clark, Wyo.	Hoar,	Pettus,
Cockrell,	Jones, Ark.	Platt, Conn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-one Senators have responded to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. MONEY] is absent from the Senate on account of sickness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

Mr. GALLINGER. I demand the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLACKBURN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS]; but that pair is transferred to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], and I vote "yea."

Mr. CARMACK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]; but I shall vote, and if that Senator does not appear I will withdraw my vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MCENERY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TALIAFERRO (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT], and therefore withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LODGE. I have a general pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY]. I do not see that Senator here this morning, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. MITCHELL (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted without noticing that my pair, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS], was absent.

Mr. HEITFELD. I will say to the Senator from Oregon that my colleague [Mr. DUBOIS] is ill this morning, but the Senator from Oregon is at liberty to vote.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does the Senator know how his colleague would vote if present?

Mr. HEITFELD. My colleague if present would vote "yea."

Mr. MITCHELL. Then I will let my vote stand.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. My colleague [Mr. MONEY], who is detained from the Senate by reason of illness, is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. MALLORY (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. As he is not present, I will withdraw my vote. I voted thinking he was here.

Mr. TILLMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], with whom I am paired, has voted? I noticed him here a while ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the Senator from Vermont has not voted.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I will withdraw my vote, because I want to preserve my pair. I do not know, however, that it will make any difference, and, under the circumstances, I will let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—41.

Allee,	Deboe,	Jones, Ark.	Rawlins,
Allison,	Dolliver,	Kean,	Simmons,
Bacon,	Dryden,	McLaurin, Miss.	Simon,
Bailey,	Fairbanks,	Martin,	Stewart,
Bard,	Foraker,	Mitchell,	Teller,
Berry,	Foster, La.	Nelson,	Tillman,
Blackburn,	Foster, Wash.	Patterson,	Wellington,
Carmack,	Frye,	Perkins,	Wetmore.
Clark, Mont.	Gallinger,	Pettus,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Platt, N. Y.
Cullom,	Heitfeld,	Quarles,

NAYS—9.

Burnham,	Kearns,	McCumber,	Millard,
Dietrich,	Kittredge,	Mason,	Platt, Conn.
Hanna,

NOT VOTING—40.

Aldrich,	Culberson,	Hawley,	Penrose,
Alger,	Daniel,	Hoar,	Pritchard,
Ball,	Depew,	Jones, Nev.	Proctor,
Bate,	Dillingham,	Lodge,	Quay,
Beveridge,	Dubois,	McComas,	Scott,
Burrows,	Elkins,	McEnery,	Spooner,
Burton,	Gamble,	McLaurin, S. C.	Taliaferro,
Clapp,	Gibson,	Mallory,	Turner,
Clark, Wyo.	Hale,	Money,	Vest,
Clay,	Hansbrough,	Morgan,	Warren.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 17243) to amend "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors and for other purposes," approved June 13, 1902.

Mr. MASON. I have quite a number of nominations of postmasters to report, and I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BAILEY. I will state to the Senator from Illinois that I will save him that trouble. If he has any idea of undertaking to defeat this bill by delay, I will withdraw it. If it is to become a law at all, it must pass the Senate within the next twenty or twenty-five minutes. If it is the purpose of the Senator to defeat it, I recognize that he can do it. All he needs to do is to say so frankly, and I will simply withdraw the bill.

Mr. MASON. I have repeatedly spoken frankly with the Senator and to the Senate. I do not think it is fair to press this bill at this time, in view of the request I made of the Senator a few moments since to give me a few minutes to get into communication by telephone with the persons interested, but I am willing that the bill shall stand now, and after we go into executive session and confirm the postmasters who are to be reported upon we can then take up the bill. We have about an hour and a half left of the session.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had appointed Mr. PAYNE, of New York, Mr. GROSVENOR, of Ohio, and Mr. RICHARDSON, of Tennessee, a committee on the part of the House to notify the President that the two Houses have completed the business of the Fifty-seventh Congress, and are ready to adjourn unless he may have some other communication to make to them.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 5118) granting an increase of pension to Adam Stuber;

An act (S. 7414) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes;

An act (S. 7307) to preserve certain souvenir medallions for the benefit of the Thomas Jefferson Memorial Association of the United States;

An act (S. 6702) granting an increase of pension to Emily Lawrence Reed;

An act (S. 3522) to increase the pension of Mexican war survivors to $12 per month; and

An act (S. 7425) authorizing and empowering the Secretary of War to locate a right of way for, and granting the same and a right to operate and maintain a line of railroad through the Vancouver Barracks and Military Reservation, in the State of Washington, to the Portland, Vancouver and Yakima Railroad Company, its successors and assigns.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Chair to join a similar committee appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses have completed the business of the present session and are ready to adjourn, unless he may have some other communication to make to them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. ALLISON and Mr. JONES of Arkansas as the committee on the part of the Senate.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to know what is the present attitude of the bill in regard to the Philippine Islands tariff?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been displaced as the unfinished business by the adoption of the motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. HOAR. I wish to say a few words upon the Philippine tariff bill that will not occupy three minutes, I think, certainly not more than five, and I should like to ask unanimous consent that that bill may be taken up for that sole purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the Philippine tariff bill may be taken up.

Mr. HOAR. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. If that bill has been displaced it can not be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that it be taken up in order that he may make a few remarks.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that it may be taken up for the sole purpose of allowing me to make some remarks upon it.

Mr. TELLER. I do not object to that.

Mr. BAILEY. I inquire if the effect of that would be to displace the bill which the Senate, on my motion, has by vote taken up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will not, because that bill will be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senator from Massachusetts may submit his remarks.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I think it is my duty to call the attention of the Senate and of country to the first great object lesson which instructs us as to the absolute unfitness of the American people undertaking to govern distant dependencies.

Here are nine or ten million people, upon whom is impending a terrible famine accompanied by pestilence. This does not rest on the authority of discontent. The statement comes from the Philippine people though their chieftain, Aguinaldo, and in even more terrible language from Governor Taft. If nine or ten million Americans had such a calamity impending over them, we would lay aside every thought of other business or affairs; we would have an extra session of Congress; we would sit day and night; the whole resources of the charity and the wealth and the humanity of the American people would be taxed to their utmost.

Now, what have we done? We have appropriated $3,000,000—30 cents, or thereabouts, apiece—to relieve that people. Governor Taft tells us that that will be utterly inefficient, and that unless we make this or some other provision for restoring their industries a terrible fate is not to be averted.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if my colleague will allow me, he surely does not quote Governor Taft as saying that $3,000,000 is not enough. That is the sum he asked for. He said $2,500,000 or $3,000,000.

Mr. HOAR. It was not enough, he said, unless we had in addition the tariff legislation which my colleague proposes.

Mr. LODGE. This is another measure here.

Mr. HOAR. I am repeating what my colleague said, in substance, in regard to the necessity for this bill.

Mr. LODGE. I thought my colleague was finding fault with the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. HOAR. Not in the least. I am saying that is what we have done. Governor Taft says, in addition to that, this thing is necessary, and my colleague, in his eloquent and manly speech the other day, said the same thing—that it was required by humanity and justice and absolute necessity—and yet we are going home for nine months; the bill is talked to death, and we have notice that it shall not be passed.

I do not say this as a criticism on the gentlemen who think that in the closing hours of the session this remedy shall not be dealt with in an hour. That is not the point. The point which I make is that the Executive, the Senate, and the House of Representatives are not fit to govern the destinies of a people who have no voice in the Government. It is the first——

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HOAR. I will get through in a minute. It is the first great object lesson of the wretchedness and iniquity of what the American people did two years ago in regard to this people. Now I will give way.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, the Senator makes some complaint because the bill to which he refers was talked to death. The fair inference is——

Mr. HOAR, No, Mr. President, I disclaim that complaint. On the contrary, I did not criticise the action of Senators who said that it was not their duty to let this bill go through within an hour or two hours without debate. My point is that the Executive, the Senate, and the House of Representatives are not fit bodies to deal with the exigencies of a people 8,000 miles away. That is my point. Does the Senator differ from me in that respect?

Mr. PATTERSON. Not in the slightest. I am in hearty accord with all the Senator says upon that subject.

I only rose, Mr. President, for the purpose of setting right any inference that might possibly be drawn from the Senator's language that some great harm had been done to the people of the Philippine Islands by reason of the defeat of this bill, because I recall that the Senator yesterday in pointed language and with irresistible logic declared and demonstrated that this bill as urged by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] could be of no earthly good to the Philippine Islands and would afford no relief.

Mr. HOAR. My point is, if the Senator will pardon me once more, not in reference to the defeat of this bill. I am speaking of our going away without doing anything.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I did not misunderstand what the main point of the Senator from Massachusetts was; but he concurred with me and with others that the bill which the junior Senator from Massachusetts urged would be of no avail and would bring no substantial benefit to the suffering people of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

I wish to call attention to a little colloquy that took place last night between the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and myself. I said in the course of the debate, on page 2991 of the RECORD:

> The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] was pressing a bill upon the consideration of the Senate, and rose in his place and said if another speech—there had been only one speech made in opposition to his bill—was to be made against his bill he would have to abandon it.
> Mr. HOAR. The Senator is as mistaken as ever a benighted individual was in this world. I never said anything of the kind.
> Mr. CARMACK. Of course, we are all benighted in comparison with the luminous and illuminating intellect of the great and distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, but all the same the Senator did substantially say that very thing, and the RECORD will show it.
> Mr. HOAR. Now the Senator has got to "substantially." I never said that thing, either verbally or otherwise. I will see what I said in a moment.
> Mr. CARMACK. The Senator did say if there was to be further debate upon his bill he would have to abandon it; that he could not pass it at this session of Congress.

The Senator from Massachusetts then retired and returned and said:

> I have from the Official Reporters verbatim et literatim what I said. I suppose the Senate has not forgotten what the Senator from Tennessee said I said. Here is what I said:
> "Mr. HOAR. I said when this matter was called up that if there was any serious desire on the part of any considerable number of Senators that it should not be disposed of now I would not press it. To that purpose I adhere. I had hoped that when the Senator from Georgia had completed his remarks, and possibly one or two other Senators had made some brief statements of their views, as we might as well have a vote on the measure now as at any time, that that would be the desire of the Senate; but I do not think within twenty-four hours of our final adjournment that I ought to press it if that proposition be not concurred in."
> That is what I said, and then the Senator made that statement and accused me of losing my temper because I did not submit to it.
> Mr. CARMACK. I hope the Senator will not leave yet.
>
> Mr. HOAR. I am not going to leave.
> Mr. CARMACK. I want to say to the Senator that if he will go back and get the next page he will get the language to which I refer.

Mr. HOAR. What followed was that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] rose and said he desired to go on with his speech. Then the Senator from Colorado rose and said that there would be other speeches, and that he did not think we could finish the bill at this session, and I withdrew it; that is all.

That is not a full and complete statement of what followed. I have no doubt the Senator from Massachusetts thought he was presenting a full and complete report of the colloquy to which reference had been made, but in his excitement (for I thought the Senator was a little more excited than the occasion required) and in his haste to return and confound me with the RECORD the Senator did not present a complete statement of what followed.

I wish to call attention to what did follow. Before the Senator from Colorado had come into the colloquy at all, before he had uttered one single word, the Senator from Massachusetts said——

Mr. HOAR. I wish the Senator would read the whole thing, if he will. Read right along.

Mr. CARMACK. I have no objection to doing that.

Mr. HOAR. The whole dialogue.

Mr. CARMACK. After what I have just read, after what the Senator read last night, this occurred:

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me just a moment?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Let me call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to one fact. All of this bill, so far as it is preventive in its character in the exclusion of anarchists, was by my motion put upon the immigration bill as an amendment, and it has become a law.

Mr. HOAR. Yes, the anarchist part of it.

Mr. BACON. That has become a law, which I consider the important part of the bill I have always been in favor of it.

Mr. HOAR. That is true.

Mr. BACON. That much has been done by this Congress. I confess, so far as I am concerned, the remainder of the bill is vicious to the last degree. While I shall not attempt to use any obstructive tactics, I shall have to debate it at length. The bill has never yet been debated in the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. That I understand, but the Senate debated the bill several days some time ago, and debated the same question.

Mr. BACON. I do not mean that the Senate never debated it at all.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. HOAR. I want to know if Senators anywhere on either side of the Chamber, if I can find out in some way, are willing to have a vote taken after the Senator from Georgia gets through? If they are not, I shall stop now.

The condition upon which the Senator stated his willingness to press the further consideration of his bill was not that there should be no extended debate, but that a vote should be taken upon the conclusion of the speech that was then being made, or, in other words, that there should be no further debate at all. That is the way I understood the Senator's language, and that is what it must mean if I have any understanding of the meaning of words. That is all I have to say.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it is hardly necessary to say anything. I should like to have put into the Senator's extract of what I said what he has omitted, in order to have the whole matter go in. I said to the Senate:

I said when this matter was called up that if there was any serious desire on the part of any considerable number of Senators that it should not be disposed of now I would not press it. To that purpose I adhere. I had hoped that when the Senator from Georgia had completed his remarks, and possibly one or two other Senators had made some brief statements of their views, as we might as well have a vote on the measure now as at any time, that that would be the desire of the Senate; but I do not think within twenty-four hours of our final adjournment that I ought to press it if that proposition be not concurred in.

Mr. CARMACK. I put that in the RECORD.

Mr. HOAR. Then, after I had expressed the hope that when the gentleman from Georgia and possibly one or two other Senators had spoken there might be a vote, the Senator from Georgia stated his reasons for wanting to debate the bill at length. Then I added—

I want to know if Senators anywhere on either side of the Chamber, if I can find out in some way, are willing to have a vote taken after the Senator from Georgia gets through?

Of course everybody, I suppose, understood—the Senator from Tennessee does not seem to have so understood it—that I did not mean that there should not be some few other brief speeches. I had said that previously. Then the Senator from Colorado rose and said what had a very significant meaning of course, coming from a Senator of his experience. He said that the bill was not likely to pass. Everybody knows what that notice meant.

I do not think this is a matter of very great importance.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HOAR. I should like to finish one sentence.

I made the statement in the purest good nature. The Senator from Tennessee made a statement which implied that I had said, in substance, that if the Senate did not stop with one speech I would withdraw the bill. I said, "My dear man, you are as much mistaken as ever a deluded man was in his life." It was not in anger, but half in jest.

Mr. CARMACK. I accept it in all good temper. I did not myself consider it a matter of any great importance, but I did not wish to be put in the attitude of trying to misrepresent the position of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE obtained the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I demand the regular order.

Mr. LODGE. I believe I was recognized, was I not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts was recognized.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have not detained the Senate in the discussion of the Philippine bill in the last forty-eight hours because, as the Senate is well aware, I was above all things anxious to have a vote upon it. I can not quite permit some of the statements which have been made here this morning to pass without a word, for if I did it might be supposed that I and the majority of the committee which I represent by silence gave assent to those statements.

The governor-general of the Philippine Islands urgently demanded three measures which he thought very necessary for the well-being of the islands and for the relief of conditions which had been produced there partly by war and partly by other causes for which no man and no government was responsible, and all of which measures he deemed to be of the first importance.

One of those measures was an appropriation of $3,000,000 to enable him to advance money, so that the people of the islands could restock their farms and secure the carabaos, or water buffaloes, necessary for their agricultural operations, 90 per cent of which had been destroyed by the rinderpest. That appropriation, as he asked it, was made in the sundry civil bill by the House and adopted by the Senate.

The measure which he put above all others was the one establishing a stable currency in the islands. That measure in the form which he desired, placing the currency in the islands upon a gold standard in such a manner as to cause the least possible shock to business and to values, has passed, and, receiving the President's signature, has become a law.

The third measure which he demanded has failed. It has not failed through any fault of the committee or of the House of Representatives. The House passed that bill at the very beginning of the session. It came here, was taken up at once by the Committee on Philippines, and was placed upon the Calendar. From the beginning of the session down to the present time I have tried constantly to find opportunity to pass those two bills. The currency bill, as I have said, has become a law. The other bill it was impossible for me to get before the Senate until yesterday. I made an attempt one afternoon early in the session, and objection was then made to the bill from the other side of the Chamber. Yesterday it was formally taken up and debated.

It was not a bill of any difficulty. It was a bill the subject-matter of which was perfectly familiar to the Senate, and it has been defeated by the opposition to it upon the other side of the Chamber. I question no man's motives. I do not quarrel with the methods. I simply state the fact.

Mr. President, it has been argued here that the bill ought not to pass because it would give no relief to the Philippine Islands, and it has also been argued that it ought not to pass because it would bring into this country such enormous importations of sugar as actually to imperil the sugar industry of the United States. As to its giving no relief to the islands, I do not suppose it would materially affect the importation of sugar from the Philippine Islands either this year or next year. The great motive of that bill, if I understand the governor-general aright, is that it would be a stimulus and a hope to the business of the island; and the greatest humanity we can show to these people is not in the gift of money, however necessary that may be, but in the opening to them of channels for the reviving of business.

The governor-general believed that this bill would stimulate business, that it would encourage business to proceed, and business would mean employment and improvement in the condition of the people. And as for its affecting any industry in this country, Mr. President, it is absolutely impossible on the face of it. As I said the other day, in the vast volume of the imports of the United States, the little amount of sugar that would come from the Philippine Islands in one year or in two years or in five years would not be known, and although it would be nothing to us, it would be everything to those people.

I do not myself agree with my colleague that the American people are not able to deal with that great problem in the East. I believe they are thoroughly able to deal with it, and that they have dealt with greater and mightier problems before. I can not, in these closing hours, undertake to argue that question, but I believe we are competent, and that we will deal with it well.

It is a great misfortune, in my judgment, that this bill has failed. It is the bill of the House. It is the bill of the committee. It is the bill of the majority of the Senate. It has been defeated here. Senators have not hesitated to take the responsibility of killing it. It was their province to do so, and the country can judge on whose shoulders the blame will lie. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Applause is not permitted in the galleries. The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] demands the regular order. The regular order is the bill before the Senate. It is in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. MASON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I have not during the session, or indeed at any time, undertaken to delay any legislation by long discussion or debate, but I can not permit this opportunity to pass without saying that we are going home, as the Senator from Massachusetts said, for nine months—some of us forever—and we are leaving undone a great duty. As this is probably the last time I shall have to deliver a lecture to my young and mistaken friends upon this floor, I want to make a suggestion to them as to their future conduct.

We came here this session, Mr. President, with many great questions pressing upon the Senate. Three new States were to be born. They were conceived in convention in both parties, and it was promised by both of the great parties that their knocking at the door for admission would not be a knocking in vain. We had the great isthmian canal to construct. To read the history of that canal, with all of its intricate diplomatic correspondence, is like reading a romance. The very moment we settled the war with Mexico, Great Britain saw the natural situation for a canal and set her ship afloat on that day. Arriving at the mouth of the San Juan River, she elected a mulatto boy king of the Mosquito Indians, assumed suzerainty over the Mosquito Indians, claimed territorial rights, and from that day to this she has stood in the door of diplomacy and prevented the construction of that great canal.

But at last we overcame it. At last, after all these years, we are to construct a canal that shall be all American, on the plan suggested by Webster and by Blaine, on a plan that will make every American proud that there is to be a great waterway constructed with American capital, defended, if necessary, by American guns, and to the present Administration we owe the new Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which gave us a right to construct the canal along American lines. So we were ready to do that.

Three new States stood knocking at the door. They are our people. Our God is their God. Their blood runs in our veins and ours in theirs. The promise was sacredly kept by breaking it, and we were able to break the promise because in this great body the minority, and not the majority, governs.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to tell the Senator from Illinois that it is perfectly apparent what his purpose is. He intends to speak this to death. I will save him the necessity of making that kind of a valedictory to the Senate. If that is his purpose, I had agreed to yield to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON], who desires to make some observations——

Mr. MASON. I will say to the Senator that he need not yield to me anything. I am not proposing to speak anything to death. I have not occupied the floor of the Senate at any time since the distinguished gentleman has been here to exceed more than ten minutes. I am not purposing now to talk anything or anybody to death. I am simply calling attention to the rules.

Mr. BAILEY rose.

Mr. MASON. I am willing to yield to the Senator to ask me a question. I have the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. I am perfectly willing to let the Senate judge what is the purpose of this kind of a speech on this kind of a bill. I will not——

Mr. MASON. The Philippine bill is the bill now pending before the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, it is not.

Mr. MASON. The Philippine bill was taken up temporarily at the request of the Senator from Massachusetts, that he might make some remarks upon it. He was followed by his colleague, the junior Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I demanded the regular order.

Mr. MASON. In the meantime I was recognized as entitled to the floor to speak upon the Philippine bill, on which I expect to speak in a moment. If the Senator desires to revise my speech, to interrupt it, or to make any suggestions to me as to what I shall speak upon, it will be the first instance of that kind that I have known of in the United States Senate. I was saying when I was interrupted——

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. PATTERSON. I want to take five minutes out of the time that will be occupied by the Senator from Illinois to make a rejoinder to some statements made by the chairman of the Philippine Committee. I will limit myself to five minutes. Will the Senator kindly yield to me?

Mr. MASON. I have no doubt there will be plenty of time. I do not expect to take long.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MASON. I suppose it would be just as well for the Senator to take the floor after I have finished my remarks. Is that agreeable?

Mr. PATTERSON. I would rather do it now. I am entitled to reply to what the Senator from Massachusetts said, and five minutes will give me all the time I desire.

Mr. MASON. I might make a reply to the Senator from Massachusetts that would suit you very much better.

Mr. PATTERSON. I am afraid the Senator from Illinois is in accord with the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts. He could only be in accord with that if he was surrounded in some degree by the darkness that surrounds the mind of the Senator from Massachusetts. I would have been through by this time if the Senator from Illinois had yielded.

Mr. MASON. And so would I, Mr. President. [Laughter.] The Senator from Colorado must realize that he has many years to serve, and that my time is exceedingly short. [Laughter.]

I was begging and pleading with my friends upon this side of the Chamber to adopt some rule hereafter so that filibustering could not be indulged in. It is the only body in the world, I believe, with the exception possibly of one or two, where the minority controls the action of the whole body. The brakeman of this railroad train is a much larger man than the general superintendent.

We deceive ourselves. We are opposed to filibustering until the time comes when we want to filibuster in our own behalf, and then we realize the necessity of unlimited debate. The distinguished Senator from Texas intimated that even I, as good as I have been for six years, who had never enlisted under the banner of filibusters, who had never taken advantage of the weak and childish rules of this body—the Senator intimated that even I, at the last moment, was endeavoring to delay legislation.

Mr. President, the statehood bill hath gone floating out on the isthmian canal. The Aldrich bill stands like the first mourner in a procession. The Philippine bill, the senior Senator from Massachusetts very wisely said, was needed to complete the promise, and he called attention to Governor Taft's statement. That also marches along in the funeral procession. The pure-food bill my distinguished successor as chairman of the Committee on Manufactures has coddled and nursed all these years. Witnesses have testified from ocean to ocean as to the necessity of having some national legislation upon pure food. But pure food and pure drink, wrapped in the panoply of mourning and despair, march along with the statehood bill, all of them going to an open grave, all of them worthy of consideration and passage, and all of them marked for the deadhouse, because the Senate of the United States is afraid to trust its own majority to transact the public business.

Mr. President, in the feeble efforts I have made in this body to amend the childish rules, this lack of rules, there never has been a suggestion that there should not be plenty and sufficient debate. Every amendment suggested as to the rules was to give at least ten days' notice before the movement for the previous question. But when any bill touches a thing that we think is not quite right we arise and, as some one has said before, we enjoy the physical exercise of the use of tongue, teeth, and vocal organs without the least impairment or exertion of the brain.

My final appeal, then, to my colleagues is: Amend your rules so that the majority can transact your business. This is a Government of majorities. The Supreme Court of the United States, which passes in final judgment upon our very act, by a decision of five to four, can change the policy of the Government, and 70,000,000 people abide by that decision and await the action that shall follow it. Under that decision of five to four, or a majority of one, the movement of the armies may be changed, the movement of the Navy may be altered, territory may be taken or surrendered, your tariff built up or taken down; but, being a Government of majorities, 70,000,000 people say, "We have submitted our cause to an honest, fair, American tribunal, and the majority of one have decided against us." But in this body all of the legislation that impinges upon the imaginary rights of anyone is marching along this line to the graveyard.

Now, Mr. President, let me say to you younger men, in the study of parliamentary law, who have had so little experience, it is not necessary for the movement of the previous question that you should absolutely cut off debate without giving the minority an opportunity of being heard. The amendment offered by one Senator gave twenty days' notice, so that each man in the minority or majority could have a fair opportunity to express himself.

But the rule or the lack of rule is here. It is here with many of the old barnacles and old habits and customs. If those gentlemen who are standing against the wall would move away an inch or two I could point to you the ancient snuffboxes. Some forty or possibly sixty years ago a resolution was passed by this body that at each session a new snuffbox should be produced and a new bunch of snuff should be introduced for the convenience of Senators upon both sides. It was a nonpartisan resolution. There is just as much snuff on the Republican side as there is on the Democratic side. It would take an act of Congress to take those snuffboxes out. But they go well with the rules of the Senate. Nobody here uses them that I have ever seen. I have never even caught one of the pages indulging in the snuff. I do not know that I ever saw a Democrat or a Republican use it. But it is there. It is a part of the dignity of the United States Senate, and, like the rules, unchangeable as the stars. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, I felt that I must say a word in reply to the junior Senator from Massachusetts. I see my friend, who has asked me to yield five minutes of my time, which I will gladly do, if he has any remarks to make. I do not wish to yield the floor at the present time, as I have a thought, and the Senate would not be happy if I should leave without delivering it to them. I will yield five minutes, or any reasonable time, to the Senator from Colorado. I desire not, however, to yield the floor.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I do not think that it is just right to allow the Senate to adjourn with the statement made by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] unchallenged. He charges that several members, although he does not impugn their motives, are responsible for the defeat of one of the measures that were recommended by the Philippine Commission for the welfare of the Philippine Islands, and he takes great credit to himself because he championed that measure.

I want to say, Mr. President, the RECORD shows that the junior Senator from the State of Massachusetts himself defeated the recommendation of the Philippine Commission. He spoke of three recommendations. The first was a gold standard for the islands. That was granted without a division. It is a gold standard, however, with no gold provided for circulation, the islands being provided altogether with silver and paper money.

The next recommendation was a reduction of at least 75 per cent of the Dingley rates of duties upon goods imported into the United States from the Philippine Islands. The House of Representatives acted upon that recommendation of the Philippine Commission and passed a tariff-reduction bill making a 75 per cent reduction, and the Senator from Massachusetts in his own right saw fit to oppose the recommendation of the Philippine Commission to cut down the reduction one-half and to insist that instead of a reduction of 75 per cent 50 per cent should be the only reduction given.

If the Senator from Massachusetts and other members of the Committee on the Philippines and other members of this body see fit arbitrarily to cut down the recommendation of the Philippine Commission one-half, can he or anybody else object when other members of this body insist that there shall be no reduction at all? He refuses one-half and we refuse the rest.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator let us pass the bill with a 75 per cent reduction?

Mr. TELLER. No.

Mr. LODGE. I thought not. The Senator's colleague has answered for him.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator from Massachusetts is getting generous at a time when he knows that it is utterly impossible for the House of Representatives to adopt the bill. I do not know what the motives were that induced the Senator from Massachusetts to oppose his mighty influence against the recommendation of the Philippine Commission, a recommendation that they insisted was necessary for the future welfare and prosperity of the Philippine Islands, and I do not think it comes with good grace from a Senator who threw himself athwart the recommendation of the Commission to find fault with those who went just a little further in the path that he blazed and the path that he made. We simply followed in his wake.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, at the beginning of the session yesterday, at sundown last night, and until nearly sunrise this morning the Philippine question was here to vex and to worry us. I had not thought to take the time of this body, and yet I am constrained, from a sense of duty, to say, why not be honest with each other and admit that we have made a mistake in the Philippine Islands? Why should we longer hug the delusion that the Republic can maintain its purity as a Republic and govern an alien people thousands of miles away without their consent? It never has been done, and it never can be done.

The junior Senator from Massachusetts, whom I am pleased to call my friend, and who is just as earnest as the senior Senator from Massachusetts, complains because his colleague says that the American people can not handle this question. He says the American people can handle any question that any other people can handle. That is true; but the race of people has never been born that can govern any people without their consent and have peace.

What is the news this morning from Manila? A battle within a short distance from the capital of the islands with our soldiers and the constabulary mixed with them. The fighting Filipino, in order to deceive ourselves, is a ladrone now; but he fights and he kills us, and he will fight; and if I were a Filipino, as I am an Americano, I would fight, too, as long as there was another soldier except my own countrymen in my country.

Make the most of this. I have no desire to say things in unkindness or bitterness, but let us be honest with each other. Our beloved country, the country that we honor and love, that our fathers fought for and our children will fight for, has made a mistake, and under the law of compensation we are settling for that mistake every hour.

I do not care what your religious faith may be, history tells us that there is no vicarious atonement for a nation's mistake. We can not go to the throne of grace and wipe out this mistake. Let us quit talking about Republicanism and Democracy. Let us get into the middle aisle of Americanism, and let us admit that we have undertaken what the older republics died of. Let us admit this mistake. Let us go fairly and frankly about it to set it right.

Gentlemen say there will be a loss of prestige. Oh, Mr. President, how can the American people lose prestige in doing right?

At the close of the war with Spain we were confronted with the two propositions. There lay Cuba with our promise that we had gone out upon the high plane for liberty. There stood Cuba asking the keeping of the promise. We pledged ourselves to the people of the world that we were not seeking territory. There were the Philippine Islands, with the same language, the same religion, born in the same climate, with the same sports, the same history. In the island of Cuba we kept faith. In the Philippine Islands we set a new standard of national honor. It was criminal aggression to break our faith with Cuba, but high destiny—things that we could charge to God—when we ravaged the home of the Filipino.

What is the result of these two treatments? In the island of Cuba there is peace. They are singing their songs of liberty. They are working out their own salvation with fear and trembling.

They know that government comes by experience. When you talk about one country governing another, you are talking about what has been tried in all of the past and has always failed. In the island of Cuba they honor the American people. In the islands of the Philippines they despise them.

Talk as you please, there is no complaint to be made of one party or another. We voted for that treaty. We made a mistake, and I speak for myself, when we did it. I trusted to older heads, with more experience and better judgment. Why not now set aside the question of party? When those people are starving to death, why not get together and say, "Let us treat them as we did in Cuba?"

Mr. Lincoln was riding in his carriage one day in Washington with a member of his Cabinet, and he got out of the carriage to turn a tumblebug on his feet that was unfortunately on his back. Some one said, "Mr. Lincoln, you have gone to a good deal of trouble for that little creature." He replied, "I want to give him an even chance with all the other bugs of his class." He did not want to annex him. [Laughter.] He did not want to put our flag over him. He simply did with the bug what we are doing in Cuba. We put Cuba on her feet and say, "God bless you, the baby Republic; work out your own salvation. We can not teach you government any more than we can teach you to swim by writing essays. You must practice, and out of your practice will come perfection."

To-day what is our situation? We are paying the debt under the law of compensation. We boasted of the wealth piled up with the unrequited toil of the slave, and yet the first touch of his black foot as a slave was a curse to our country. Mr. Lincoln said at Gettysburg, "If this must continue until all of the wealth piled up by the unrequited toil of the slave is dispersed, until every drop of blood drawn by the lash shall be repaid by one drawn by the sword, truly we must say the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether."

Mr. ALLISON and Mr. JONES of Arkansas, of the joint committee who were appointed to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that Congress was ready to adjourn, appeared at the bar of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Illinois suspend for one moment?

Mr. MASON. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, the joint committee on behalf of the two Houses have waited upon the President and informed him that the work of the session is completed unless he may have some further communication to make. In response, the President said to us that he had no further communication to make, and he added that if it was in order—he did not know whether it was or not—he would like to say that he congratulated the two Houses of Congress upon the admirable work performed during this session.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I see the time has arrived when other matters are to take place here in this Chamber. I wish to apologize in a way to the Senate particularly for taking this hour, but the Senate will bear me out that during this session I have not taken time upon this or any other measure. If I have offended by fighting for what seems to me to be the old Republican principles, I hope you will find it in your heart to forgive me.

My father taught me that every man is entitled to his liberty and that the color of his skin or his religion has nothing to do with it. I had great reverence for him. I never saw tears in his eyes but once, and that was upon the death of Mr. Lincoln. That has been born within me; you can not get it out. I hope that you will greatly bear with me just this one minute when I say to you, do the fair thing by the Filipinos. Those people are entitled to their homes. They are just as much entitled to govern themselves as we are. Mr. President, I am done.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, as strong as the temptation would be to have something to say in reply to the Senator from Illinois, I prefer to have a vote on the bill, and I demand a vote.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I left out the very best part of my speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. I make the point of order that the Senator from Illinois having addressed the Senate and having yielded the floor he is not entitled to resume it again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is obliged, under the rules, to recognize him in his own right.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I will at least force him to speak this session out.

Mr. MASON. Well, the Senator from Texas can force me to no more pleasing duty. Like the distinguished Senator, I love to hear the sound of my own voice. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, upon this question——

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me for one moment?

Mr. BAILEY. I object to the Senator from Illinois yielding to anybody. It can not be done except by unanimous consent.

Mr. COCKRELL. I then ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Illinois may yield in order that I may present a resolution.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator has to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate before he can yield to anybody, because under the rules of the Senate a Senator can not yield without unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PETTUS in the chair). The Chair is of a different opinion.

THANKS TO THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, it affords me sincere pleasure to present to the Senate and to ask the present consideration of a resolution of thanks to our President pro tempore for the uniform courtesy, impartiality, ability, and dignity with which he has presided over the deliberations of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate are hereby tendered to the Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE, President pro tempore of the Senate, for the courteous, dignified, and able manner with which he has presided over its deliberations during the present session.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I desire heartily to approve this resolution, and I desire to say that one of the reasons why I approve it is that the President of the Senate, in a case relating to my occupancy of the floor, decided distinctly and positively different from what the present occupant of the chair has just decided. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

The hour of 12 o'clock m. having arrived,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore said: Senators, I appreciate highly this expression of your confidence. I can only hope that in some regard as your Presiding Officer I may have merited it. May God's benediction abide with you all. Your Presiding Officer declares the Senate adjourned sine die.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 4, 1903.

[Continuation of legislative day of February 26, 1903.]

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker at 10 o'clock a. m.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of no quorum, whereupon the gentleman from New York moves a call of the House.

Mr. PAYNE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. And on that motion the gentleman from New York calls for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 17, nays 140, answered "present" 55, not voting 138; as follows:

Mr. WANGER with Mr. ADAMSON.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont with Mr. POU.

Mr. CURTIS with Mr. BURGESS.

Mr. COOMBS with Mr. DAVEY of Louisiana.

Mr. PATTERSON of Pennsylvania with Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama.

Mr. CANNON assumed the chair amid loud general applause.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

VOTE OF THANKS TO THE SPEAKER.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York offers the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House are presented to the Hon. DAVID B. HENDERSON, Speaker of the House of Representatives, for the able, impartial, and dignified manner in which he has presided over its deliberations and performed the arduous and important duties of the Chair during the present term of Congress.

[Loud applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I feel it a high honor and privilege to be permitted to offer this resolution to the retiring Speaker of the House of Representatives; and it is not the first time, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution has been offered by a member of the majority party, although similar resolutions have been offered and passed by every Congress, commencing with the first Congress, in our history. There are numerous cases, Mr. Speaker, in which the resolution has met with opposition, in which there have been votes in opposition, and in which a member in sympathy politically with the majority has offered this resolution. In the Fifth Congress such a precedent occurred, when Speaker Dayton was retiring; in the Sixth Congress, as to Speaker Sedgwick; in the Tenth Congress, as to Speaker Varnum; in the Twelfth Congress, when that man who has illuminated the history of his country, Henry Clay, was retiring from the Speaker's office. [Applause.] Again in the Twentieth, when Speaker Stevenson retired; again in the Twenty-fifth Congress, when James K. Polk laid down the gavel, still he was refused a unanimous vote of thanks from that Congress. In the Twenty-seventh Congress, Speaker White; in the Thirtieth Congress, that noted Speaker in history, Speaker Winthrop, of Massachusetts; in the Thirty-second and Thirty-third, Speaker Boyd; in the Thirty-fourth, Speaker Banks; in the Thirty-fifth Congress, Speaker Orr; in the Thirty-sixth Congress, Speaker Pennington; in the Forty-seventh Congress, Speaker Keifer; in the Fifty-first Congress, that great Speaker, that great statesman, that man who, recently called from the scenes of life, is mourned by the nation, Thomas B. Reed [loud applause], was refused this recognition. And so we are not without precedent. The House honors itself by honoring the office of the Speaker of the House—the great office of Speaker of the House—by passing such a resolution as this. And, of the long line of Speakers, bearing in mind the history of each of his predecessors, what Speaker is more entitled to this recognition, as he lays down the insignia of his office, for his impartiality, for his readiness to recognize the opposition and the members of the opposition, as well as the members of his own party, for the dignity with which he has conducted the affairs of his office, for his high character in that, office than DAVID B. HENDERSON? [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CANNON). The gentleman from New York demands the previous question.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The question of ordering the yeas and nays was taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Twenty-one members have arisen to demand the yeas and nays. Necessary to call the yeas and nays, 42. The yeas and nays are refused. [Applause on the Republican side.] The question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. COCHRAN. I demand the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Seventeen gentlemen have arisen. Forty-two is necessary to demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays are refused. The ayes have it, and the resolution is adopted. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill 14051, entitled "An act granting the consent of Congress to N. F. Thompson and associates to erect a dam and construct a power station at Muscle Shoals, Alabama."

The recent development of the application of water power to the production of electricity available for use at considerable distances has revealed an element of substantial value in streams which the Government is or is liable to be called upon to improve for purposes of navigation, and this value, in my judgment, should be properly utilized to defray the cost of the improvement. Wherever the Government constructs a dam and lock for the purpose of navigation there is a waterfall of great value. It does not seem right or just that this element of local value should be given away to private individuals of the vicinage, and at the same time the people of the whole country should be taxed for the local improvement.

It seems clear that justice to the taxpayers of the country demands that when the Government is or may be called upon to improve a stream the improvement should be made to pay for itself, so far as practicable. I am advised that at another point on the same river to which this bill refers there is an authorized project for improvement by the Government at a cost of over $800,000, and that an offer has been made by a responsible citizen to do the entire work without expense to the Government provided he can be authorized to use the water power. I think it is desirable that the entire subject of granting privileges of the kind referred to in this bill should be considered in a comprehensive way and that a general policy appropriate to the new conditions caused by the advance in electrical science should be adopted under which these valuable rights will not be practically given away, but will be disposed of after full competition in such a way as shall best conserve the public interests.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, March 3, 1903.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby given to N. F. Thompson, J. W. Johnson, J. E. Thompson, and Scott Dibert, for themselves, associates, or assigns, to construct a dam or dams in the Tennessee River at such points as they may elect, between the western line of section 6, township 3, range 9, and the mouth of Town Creek in northern portion of Lawrence County, Ala., along the southern bank of said river, for the purpose of erecting and operating power stations, and to maintain inlet and outlet races or canals and to make such other improvements as may be necessary for the development of water power and transmission of the same: Provided, That the constructions hereby authorized do not in any way interfere with the Muscle Shoals Canal, or with navigation of said river: Provided further, That until the plans and location of the work herein authorized, so far as they affect the interests of navigation, have been approved by the Secretary of War, the improvements shall not be commenced or built, and the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to fix reasonable charges for use of said power.

SEC. 2. That unless the work herein authorized shall be commenced within one year and completed within three years from date hereof the privileges hereby granted shall cease and determine.

SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or to repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message be referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before the gentleman proceeds, the Chair desires to submit a matter for unanimous consent. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, representing the majority, and myself, representing the minority, may have the privilege of printing a financial statement within the next two days in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON], at the head of the minority upon that committee, may print the usual statement of appropriations within the next two days in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] moves to refer this message and the accompanying bill to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry; whether it is not admissible to make a motion that this bill be put on its passage, notwithstanding the veto of the President.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to refer takes precedence.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I could not hear the reasons that the President gave for vetoing——

Mr. PAYNE. Before the gentleman proceeds, I will modify my motion and substitute the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has a right to modify his motion. The question is now on referring the veto message to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. PAYNE. Now I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, amidst the confusion in the House I was utterly unable to hear the reasons given by the Chief Executive for his disapproval of this small local act, which certainly guards and protects the interests of the Government as much as any bill of this character that ever passed this House. As an evidence of that, Mr. Speaker, I desire to read what the Chief Engineer of the United States Army, General Gillespie, says about it:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, May 10, 1902.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith a letter, dated the 30th ultimo, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives, inclosing for the views of the War Department thereon H. R. 14051, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, "A bill granting to N. F. Thompson and associates the right to erect a dam and construct power station at Muscle Shoals, Alabama," and in reply to its reference to this office, I beg to recommend certain amendments to the bill, which are indicated on a copy of the same herewith submitted.

The Chief Engineer of the United States Army proceeds to state the only objection that could possibly be urged against the bill; and in accordance with his suggestion the bill was amended so as to obviate that objection. He says further:

As thus amended, I know of no objection to the passage of the bill by Congress, so far as the interests of navigation are concerned.

Attention is invited to the fact, however, that by an act approved March 3, 1899, which is still in full force and effect, Congress granted to the Muscle Shoals Power Company a privilege similar to the one embraced in the bill under consideration.

Very respectively, your obedient servant,

G. L. GILLESPIE,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

Hon. EDIHU ROOT,
Secretary of War.

This bill simply proposes to grant to N. F. Thompson and associates the consent of Congress for themselves and associates to construct a dam or dams at certain points on the Tennessee River. I am as much opposed as anyone on this floor to the grant by the Government of the exclusive right to any company or class of men to enjoy a certain franchise. This bill does not pretend to carry an exclusive franchise. The same privilege granted by this bill is open to the world. It requires that the work must commence in one year after the passage of the law and be finished in three, or the franchise will be forfeited.

This power company, exercising the franchise granted to N. F. Thompson and his associates, is to be located at a part of the Tennessee River where it can not possibly interfere with navigation. The Tennessee Valley, is growing and increasing in a manner unsurpassed by any section of the American Union. The promoters associated in this matter, without intending to interfere with the rights of navigation in any way, propose simply to establish a power there by which (the water power and the transmission of the same) they will transmit light to different cities, and also run cotton factories and power stations. Why the President of the United States should have been induced or persuaded in any way to disapprove a local bill of this character, to which the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army says there is no objection whatever, I can not understand.

Under these conditions and circumstances I think it right, Mr. Speaker, for me to present these views. We have been engaged in a contest here for several days; but I have seen no local bill that has been brought up that has not received, under a suspension of the rules, a two-thirds vote. As I have said, I could not hear read the reasons stated by the President for vetoing this local bill. I never heard of the veto until yesterday; and I confess I am surprised. I should have been glad to meet the reasons assigned for interposing this veto.

Why, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in this measure except that which has been granted repeatedly during this session on this floor. The Government is amply protected in this bill by the following proviso:

Provided, That the constructions hereby authorized do not in any way interfere with the Muscle Shoals Canal, or with navigation of said river: Provided further, That until the plans and location of the work herein authorized, so far as they affect the interests of navigation, have been approved by the Secretary of War, the improvements shall not be commenced or built, and the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to fix reasonable charges for use of said power.

If it be a valuable franchise, then the Secretary of War will ascertain that fact and act accordingly, because he is "authorized and directed to fix reasonable charges for the use of said power." There certainly should be no trouble on that line. The right provided does not interfere with navigation. If it is valuable the Government will charge for it.

How could the Government be better safeguarded and protected than by leaving the determination of this matter in the hands of the Secretary of War.

I am very much obliged to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] for giving me the time that he has granted.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the veto of the President is right; and I do not abandon the hope that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] will himself come to the same conclusion when he has carefully examined this veto message. The message is sufficient in itself, and needs no additional argument from me or from anyone else. It is aimed at a vicious practice, which has been illustrated, not one hundred times, as the gentleman Alabama states, but perhaps ten or twelve times, by legislation enacted by Congress. You can not say this is a mere local measure. Such a bill as this fixes a precedent for the use of water power on every navigable stream in the United States.

What does it do? It says that in a stretch of the Tennessee River, where there is water power which, under the present development in the utilization of power of this nature, is worth millions of dollars, three or four individuals named in this bill shall have the sole and only right to utilize that privilege.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. It says in effect that no other citizen of Tennessee, no other citizen of the United States in that locality can enter there and utilize that power.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Is it not a fact that in this very bill, as to the value of the rights that may be granted, the Secretary of War is allowed to make such charges as he may think right and proper?

Mr. BURTON. I will answer that question in the gentleman's own words in some remarks made in this House last June. He then said it was expected that those charges would be only nominal.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. And, Mr. Speaker, allow me to say in that respect that in that matter I have been greatly disappointed, and the Government has not accepted the views that I then entertained that those charges would be nominal. There is the trouble.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I yielded simply for a question. The injury done by legislation of this kind is twofold. In the first place it gives away a privilege of the greatest value and fixes a precedent by which the Government, after making expensive public works in rivers, constructing locks and dams or otherwise, absolutely barters away for nothing that which is of greater value than the cost of the works themselves. In the next place it means that no one shall enjoy that privilege except he comes here and passes a bill through Congress, thereby throwing the doors wide open for favoritism and monopoly. If this bill is analyzed and its full effect is considered it seems to me that any gentleman who advocates such a proposition will have difficulty in explaining to his constituents why he is willing to select one individual or a coterie of individuals, a company or a corporation, to give to him or them alone so great an advantage. This House has occasion for congratulation that the President by the veto ax has put his seal of disapproval upon measures of this kind.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, are very singular, at least in one respect. He gives no reasons whatsoever, either as given by the President or himself, why this bill should have been vetoed; and I call the attention of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] to the fact that a similar bill granting a like power to the Muscle Shoals Company, located about the same place, passed with the approval of the distinguished gentleman and of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the Fifty-fifth Congress, and also an act that I recently had amended by extension of time involving exactly the same principle, and there was no objection made then by the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, came from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which inquired into the facts. The gentlemen constituting that committee know well what the facts are, and by unanimous vote sent the bill to this House. But that committee has been overruled. After a committee of that importance has investigated the facts and by unanimous report sent the bill to Congress, are we to be expected now to stop here simply because the President, under some influence, by the operation of some power, has been induced to veto this little local bill? It is the same kind of a bill that we have passed many times before, and there is no man who can tell what reasons the President has given for vetoing this bill, not a man. We are not expected just simply because it comes in here with an Executive veto to indorse it and approve it unless we think it is right to do so.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. And upon that, Mr. Speaker, I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 158, nays 85, answered "present" 10, not voting 97; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Chair to join a similar committee appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses have completed the business of the present session and are ready to adjourn, unless he may have some other communication to make to them.

And that in compliance with the foregoing the President pro tempore appointed as said committee on the part of the Senate Mr. ALLISON and Mr. JONES of Arkansas.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON PRESIDENT.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a committee of three be appointed to join the committee appointed by the Senate to wait on the President.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that a committee of three be appointed by the Speaker to join the committee appointed by the Senate to wait upon the President. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair appoints the gentleman from New York, Mr. PAYNE, the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GROSVENOR, and the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. RICHARDSON.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles:

H. R. 17493. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for prior years, and for other purposes;

H. R. 15155. An act to refund the amount of duties paid on merchandise brought into the United States from Porto Rico between April 11, 1899, and May 1, 1900, and also on merchandise brought into the United States from the Philippine Islands between April 11, 1899, and March 8, 1902, and for other purposes;

H. R. 3420. An act granting a pension to Anna O. Brush;

H. R. 11340. An act for the relief of McClure & Willbanks;

H. R. 16881. An act to authorize the court of county commissioners of Geneva County, Ala., to construct a bridge across the Choctawhatchee River in Geneva County, Ala.; and

H. R. 17288. An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 6702. An act granting an increase of pension to Emily Lawrence Reed; and

The SPEAKER resumed the chair amid loud and long-continued applause on both sides of the House.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the committee appointed by the House to join a similar committee on the part of the Senate to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses had completed their business and to inquire whether he had any further communication to make, have performed that duty, and the President replies that he has no further communication to make; and if it should be in order, and he does not know whether it is in order or not, he desires to congratulate the two Houses of Congress upon the valuable work they have performed. [Loud applause.]

NEW OFFICE BUILDING.

The SPEAKER. The Chair makes the following announcement:

The Clerk read as follows:

The Commission to construct the new office building, Mr. J. G. CANNON, Mr. W. P. HEPBURN, Mr. J. D. RICHARDSON.

VOTE OF THANKS TO SPEAKER.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives has passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House are presented to the Hon. DAVID B. HENDERSON, Speaker of the House of Representatives, for the able, impartial, and dignified manner in which he has presided over its deliberations and performed the arduous and important duties of the chair during the present term of Congress.

[Loud general applause.]

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, an age spent under this Dome must give opportunity for forming many and strong ties. Constituted as I have been from childhood, friendship is an essential element of my life's food [applause], and whether on the floor or in the Chair I have found a bountiful supply in this Hall. [Applause.] I have seen beautiful and instructive things on this floor—sharp, able, feeling debate; and debate, gentlemen, is the foundation and sustaining power of American liberty. [Applause.] But I have seen another beautiful thing. When the flag was raised in war I have seen both sides of this Chamber, as one man, put $50,000,000 into the hands of the Chief Magistrate and say, "Lead on," without a dissenting voice. [Applause.] I say that from that hour I have believed that there was no future moment when disintegration could come to this Republic. [Applause.] And when I saw the young men from every State in the Union touching elbow to elbow and rushing into the ranks of war, there was absolute confirmation of that belief. [Applause.]

I have no fears for the future of my country. Let no one be disturbed by the battles on this floor. As I said, they are guaranties of freedom, and I approve of them. At times there may be scars left, but they are not scars that leave a permanent cripple, but scars that leave the soul and the manhood without a dangerous wound. For one, go where I may from this Hall, I shall carry with me in my heart an affectionate recollection of the friends that I have met here, and I do not know of one enemy. [Applause.]

Whenever I meet any member of this body in the future I shall feel that I meet a legislative comrade, and I know that he will meet a friend. [Applause.]

I am not going to give counsel to this body further than to say that there is nothing more precious than this Government for us to fight for. Preserve that if you lose your life. It is more valuable than anything that can be named. Go on with the rough-and-tumble battles of legislation, but keep your eye on that flag which God asks us to die for. [Applause.]

When I took this chair I asked the support of this House to aid me in performing the duties of this high office you conferred upon me. That gavel in my hand has never been defied by either side of this Chamber. It is a pleasure to say that. It has always secured obedience; recognition when order was demanded. Knowing how excited we are at times, that is a pleasant recollection to me.

Now, gentlemen, if I know my feelings toward this body of men, I know that I shall carry with me through life the image of this hour, with its generous approval and treatment of me this morning. I shall carry every one of your faces in my memory, and I shall never cease to feel an interest in this great body, which stands so near to the happiness of my countrymen. And now, I bid you good-bye. [Prolonged applause, every member rising in his place.]

And now, in pursuance of the Constitution, I declare the Fifty-seventh Congress adjourned sine die.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A message from the President, transmitting a report from the Secretary of War showing expenditures made from the appropriation for "Barracks and quarters, Philippine Islands, 1903"—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A message from the President, returning without approval House bill No. 14051, entitled "An act granting the consent of Congress to N. F. Thompson and associates to erect a dam and construct a power station at Muscle Shoals, Alabama"—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 958) for the relief of the Mission of St. James, in the State of Washington, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 3918); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. DICK, from the Committee on Militia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 17053) to provide for a militia veteran reserve, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 3919); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS INTRODUCED.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred, as follows:

By Mr. WEEKS (by request): A resolution (H. J. Res. 283) providing for the erection of a statue of John Brown, of Osawatomie, Kans., in the city of Richmond, in the State of Virginia—to the Committee on the Library.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, the following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. GRAHAM: Resolutions of Good Will Lodge, No. 106, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, Allegheny, Pa., in favor of the passage of the Foraker safety-appliance bill—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. MOODY: Petition of Eugene Divinity School, Eugene, Oreg., for the passage of a bill to forbid the sale of intoxicating liquors in all Government buildings—to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

Also, memorial of legislative assembly of Oregon, urging the improvement of the Columbia River—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. HENRY C. SMITH: Petition of J. S. Van Alstyne, of Wyandotte, asking for the erection of a public building in Wyandotte, Mich.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. TOMPKINS of New York: Petition of citizens of Bloomingburg and Burlingham, N. Y., protesting against the enactment of a parcels-post law—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. YOUNG: Petition of Central Labor Union of Philadelphia, Pa., protesting against House bill 9685, known as the sailors' bill—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Statehood Bill.

SPEECH

OF

HON. HENRY E. BURNHAM,

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Tuesday, January 21, 22, 23, and 27, 1903.

The Senate having under consideration the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States—

Mr. BURNHAM said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: As a member of the Committee on Territories and one of a subcommittee which recently visited New Mexico, Arizona, Oklahoma, and the Indian Territory, I have listened to the testimony of many witnesses and the statements and arguments of others who are interested in the bill now pending before the Senate known as the omnibus statehood bill.

It has also been my privilege to obtain from personal observation and from interviews with many of the people of these Territories some impression as to the physical conditions there existing upon which the claims to statehood are based, and to gain some information as to the character and habits of the people, their race divisions, and their social, moral, and educational standing.

The time of the subcommittee, limited by the Senate agreement, was fully occupied while in these Territories by taking testimony, listening to statements, visiting schools, driving about the cities and out into the country districts, and by the long journeys from place to place where our investigations were made.

Much information was received during this visit that could not otherwise have been obtained, and the members of the committee sought for evidence, impartially and from all sources, that would bear upon the important facts involved in this statehood measure.

New Mexico was reached first in our journey, a Territory of great historical interest, where in an unknown period of time the cliff dwellers had their homes, and where a later race of uncertain origin had made some progress in civilization, had engaged in agriculture, and constructed ditches and canals for purposes of irrigation, evidences of which are found to-day by those who are occupied in the same work.

Here, too, are found fragments of pottery and ruins of habitations used and occupied by Indian tribes, and here are seen the mission churches and the old palace at Santa Fe built by Spanish colonists more than three centuries ago. It is an interesting fact that this Spanish occupation preceded the settlement at Jamestown and the coming of the Mayflower.

It was from these colonists, who crossed from Mexico into this Territory, that we have by descent that large number of Mexicans who now constitute the majority of the population.

The boundary lines of New Mexico form a parallelogram. Its average breadth is 335 miles and its length 367.

The general slope of the land is from north to south, from an elevation of about 7,000 feet above the sea to 3,500 feet at the southern border, thus falling away on an average of about 10 feet to the mile.

Mountain peaks, reaching a height of 8,000 to 13,000 feet, with their connecting ranges, divide the Territory into five distinct watersheds.

The Rio Grande, passing from north to south, separates the land into two nearly equal portions. On the northeast is the Canadian River, whose waters finally pass into the Mississippi. On the southeast the river Pecos flows for a considerable distance and unites with the Rio Grande. In the northwest the San Juan and in the southwest the Gila are the principal rivers.

This Territory has an area of 122,580 square miles, being equal in extent to all of New England, New York, and New Jersey and larger by 1,900 square miles than the combined area of England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales.

THE CENSUS.

This vast extent of land is sparsely inhabited. By the last census it had only 1.6 inhabitants to the square mile. The accuracy of that census has been questioned, and one of the inquiries made by the subcommittee was for the purpose of determining whether or not the census returns were substantially correct.

Seventy-eight enumerators had been appointed to take this census; they were assisted by interpreters, among whom were 13 who could speak the Spanish language and interpret for the American enumerators.

They were amply compensated, and doubtless sought these appointments because of the pay they would receive. In many instances, perhaps in nearly all cases, they were paid according to the number they returned, and their own interest, therefore, prompted them to make a careful and complete enumeration.

Mr. FORAKER. Would the Senator object to my interrupting him to ask a question?

Mr. BURNHAM. Not in the least.

Mr. FORAKER. Would it be convenient to the Senator to state in this connection what the compensation was that the enumerators were to receive for each name returned? I ask for information.

Mr. BURNHAM. My impression is that it was two and a half or three cents apiece, and a per diem pay, in some cases, which amounted, I think, to $5.

Mr. LODGE. The same pay as in all the Territories.

Mr. BURNHAM. The same pay.

Besides, the question of statehood was at that time generally discussed. The importance of a full enumeration must have been present to the minds of the enumerators and thoroughly considered by those who were most interested in having a full return, and who, therefore, would see that the work was faithfully done.

While the taking of the census in this Territory has been criticised by the advocates of statehood, and claims have been made that the population was in fact many thousands in excess of the census returns, yet it does not appear that in the cities, or anywhere throughout the Territory, any attempt has been made by actual canvass to refute the official figures.

But if any doubt could have existed as to the substantial accuracy of the census, it must have been settled by the sworn testimony of the large number of enumerators who appeared before the committee and stated that they took an oath to faithfully perform their duties as census enumerators; that they did perform those duties, and that their returns were as accurate and as complete as they could make them.

These enumerators were their own people. They were men who for years had lived in that Territory and were familiar, as I submit, with the country, with its people, and with all its conditions. Besides, they were men who had taken a solemn oath faithfully and fully to make return of all the people residing in their several districts. I believe they were fully and amply compensated. At all events, they sought those offices themselves; they knew their districts, knew the business, and the duties in which they were about to be engaged; they knew their compensation, and I believe that they were faithful and reliable men. When we come to take their statements, we find that each and every one says that his return is substantially correct with some few possible omissions.

It seems to me that it bears somewhat upon this statehood question if it be true that 78 census enumerators in that Territory have so egregiously failed in the performance of their sworn duty. It reflects somewhat, I submit, upon the people whom they represent.

I believe that they were surrounded by influences which would prompt them to make a true and faithful return. I believe that among those people there was a feeling that it was a most important question, How many people are there in this Territory? They would base their claim to statehood upon the number that would be returned, and the men selected for that purpose, some with experience in the taking of former censuses, the men who came before us, were intelligent and capable enough to find the number of people in the Territory.

I have no doubt that some of the men were away and that families were away. They were away during the summer season possibly, and some of them were prospectors in the mountains. But take the cities. Is it possible, for instance, that in the city of Phoenix 5,000 people were omitted in the taking of the census? The enumerators hunted for those names and hunted for those people, and did it successfully. Indeed, I find that one of the census enumerators was so earnest and so faithful that even before his term of office began he was looking for the names of people for the purpose of making a return, and making that return full and complete. Others stated definitely that they had used every possible endeavor to hunt up those people, and that they did not think there was a man, woman, or child whom they could possibly find who was omitted.

This shows somewhat the character of the enumeration. I will continue with a further statement in reference to these enumerators, particularly with their testimony as they came before the committee, and satisfied us by their intelligence and appearance that they were men who would not fail to do their sworn duty.

It is not to be supposed that all of the inhabitants of that Territory were enumerated; neither is it to be believed that many thousands were omitted.

Doubtless at that season of the year some from among the wealthier classes were at seaside or mountain resorts, and some, living in places remote and difficult of access, escaped attention; but I appeal to the personal knowledge of Senators whether in their cities or in their communities any considerable per cent of the people are away at such resorts at any time who could not be found and returned by the census. It is a little singular that Oklahoma, not so far away, has no complaint to make of its census. There, indeed, returns were made by census enumerators, who all concede, faithfully performed their duty. Why is it that the census is all wrong in New Mexico and Arizona and is perfectly satisfactory and right in the Territory of Oklahoma?

But it is said that in places remote and difficult of access some escaped attention. I have no doubt that there was a limited number away in the mountains. There were prospectors in the mountains hunting for gold, hunting for precious minerals in the mountain fastnesses; but that number could not have been very considerable.

I can not believe that the population of these Territories was so elusive that the enumerators could not find it. If prospectors were not found, can it be said by anyone that they are a part of the permanent citizenship of these Territories? Are they not of necessity a migratory people? Are they not here to-day and gone to-morrow? As one of the enumerators said, perhaps a few of these prospectors were still remaining in the Territory, but they might in a day or a week or a month be in Colorado, or they might be in Nevada, or somewhere else. They are not permanent citizens; and I am sure they can not fairly be reckoned as citizens of these Territories, although, of course, if they are found they are enumerated in the census. The conclusion of the committee was that both the census of this Territory and the census of the other Territory of Arizona—I have been speaking more particularly of New Mexico—were faithfully taken and were substantially correct; that conclusion is sustained by the evidence of the enumerators themselves and established by all the probabilities that bear upon the question.

It must then be found that the total population of New Mexico at the time of taking the census of 1900 was substantially 195,310, divided as follows: White, 180,207; Indian, 13,144; Negro, 1,610; Chinese, 341; Japanese, 8.

It would appear from the census that the growth of this Territory has not been rapid. But it is said in explanation that growth has been prevented for years on account of Indian ravages. I may be entirely mistaken, but it seems to me it is a good many years since Indians have interfered with the citizens of the Territory of New Mexico or have prevented agriculturists from occupying the lands wherever they could be fairly and profitably cultivated. It has been said that the Spanish or Mexican land grants prevented the securing of good titles. That is undoubtedly true to a considerable extent. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] stated, if I remember correctly, that there were 30,000,000 acres in that Territory held under those Spanish grants. That left more than 48,000,000 acres. Barring certain small Indian reservations, it left that much territory which has been occupied only to a very limited extent.

The question that meets us at the outset of this debate is whether that number of inhabitants will justify a claim for statehood. The Constitution does not answer this question, but leaves the admission of Territories to the discretion and judgment of Congress.

In the report upon the new statehood bill, submitted to the Senate by the chairman of the Committee on Territories, attention is called to the ordinance of 1787 for the government of the Northwest Territory, and particularly to the provisions contained in the fifth article of that ordinance. I wish to quote from that report:

RULE AS TO POPULATION.

While the preparedness of a community asking statehood is left to the good sense of Congress, we are not without an established rule. When the Constitution was adopted no such development as we have experienced was contemplated; but still the Republic was then in possession of the Northwest Territory and the formation of States out of that Territory was contemplated.

The last work performed by the Continental Congress relates to this, and, as Daniel Webster declared, is second in the importance, value, and wisdom of its provisions only to the Constitution itself. This was the famous ordinance of 1787 for the government of the Northwest Territory.

This ordinance provides for the future division of said Territory into not more than five nor less than three States, and it fixed the boundaries of three of them, namely, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. The fifth article of that ordinance provides that—

"Whenever any of said States shall have 60,000 free inhabitants therein such State shall be admitted, by its delegates, into the Congress of the United States on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government."

It is thus seen that the fathers, even in the eighteenth century, provided—

First. For very large States as to area and resources (for it was then well known that the Northwest Territory was rich in agricultural resources and the natural home of a mighty population); and Second. That each of these States must have a population which, in comparison with the population of the rest of the Republic at that time, was very heavy indeed.

This rule was referred to by President Washington in his message transmitting to Congress the constitution of Tennessee, and President Washington added that—

"As proofs of the several requisites to entitle all the Territories south of the Ohio River to be admitted as a State into the Union, Governor Blount has transmitted a return of the enumeration of its inhabitants," etc.

"SIXTY-THOUSAND RULE" BASIS FOR SLIDING SCALE.

This number, however, was not intended to be a permanent requisite, but a standard referring to the population of the rest of the nation at the time. By comparing 60,000 (the number of people required for statehood in 1787) with the population of the Nation at that time we find the ratio which statesmen of that day deemed essential as between communities applying for statehood and the Nation itself. At that time the population of the United States was less than 4,000,000. If 60,000 were required as the first requisite for statehood when the population of the Nation was less than 4,000,000, the same rule would require a population at the present time of over 1,153,000; and every reason supporting the rule of 60,000 established by the fathers' ordinance of 1787 requires as many more than 60,000 now as the population of the Nation itself at present is larger than it was one hundred and fifteen years ago.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate just for a moment to the fact that a population of 60,000 was fixed upon in the ordinance for the Northwest territory as a prerequisite to statehood. Was it a mere arbitrary number, fixed without regard to other relations? I believe that there was some reason for this number being designated in the ordinance, and the only reason, I submit, that can occur to any Senator is that it bore some relation to the total population of the country as understood at the time. The population of the country then was something more than 3,000,000. This number of 60,000 would be substantially one-fiftieth of that total population. There was, I submit, some reason, some basis, or some ground for putting that number into the ordinance, and I query of any Senator what possible reason could be given except that it bore some relation to the total population, which was understood then to be fair and just and right?

Now, if there was in that ordinance some reference to the total population, some comparison between the number fixed upon and that total, why should we not carry out the same idea to-day and maintain that the population of a Territory should bear some just and fair proportion to the total population of the whole country?

The fathers who framed this ordinance must have had in mind the total population of the nation at that time, and must have considered the numerical question with great care when determining that 60,000 free inhabitants were a requisite to the formation and admission of a new State.

This number and the ratio it bore to the total population must have been understood at that time to be just and fair to the Northwest Territory and to the original States. From this rule, so established, it would follow that as the total population increased during succeeding years so would the standard for admission change, and a proportionately larger number would be required of each Territory claiming statehood.

Under that rule, as appears in the report, the required population at the present time would be over 1,153,000.

At the time of the admission of Kansas as a State another and a different rule was introduced—a rule which would require that the population of a new State should at least be equal to the unit of representation in the House of Representatives. According to the census of 1900, this would require a population of 194,182.

I desire to read from the act of Congress approved May 4, 1858, with reference to Kansas, the following, which seems to be applicable:

If the people of Kansas do not desire admission under the conditions set forth in said proposition, the people of said Territory are hereby authorized and empowered to form for themselves a constitution and State government, by the name of the State of Kansas, according to the Federal Constitution, and may elect delegates for that purpose whenever, and not before, it is ascertained by a census, duly and legally taken, that the population of said Territory equals or exceeds the ratio of representation required for a member of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States.

This rule has never been followed in the subsequent procedure of Congress, and there would seem to be no good reason for its adoption.

I call attention to this fact—that here again was an attempt to find a ratio between the population of a Territory claiming admission and the total number of inhabitants in the whole country.

In the same report a new rule has been suggested, and the statement is made that "it would have been well and would now be well if the rule could be adopted that any new State should have a population equal to the average population of the remainder of the States."

Under this rule the required number for any new State at the present time would be 1,650,000.

While this rule might not be assented to because, as might be said, it places the standard too high, yet its statement calls attention to the fact, which should be given great consideration in determining the present question of statehood, that the Republic now has a population of over 76,000,000, that the average of the States is now 1,650,000, and that the population of a new State should bear some just proportion to that average.

For the purpose of calling attention to these proportions, that we may have in mind what doubtless every Senator in a general way understands, I wish to note the resources of the country as they are to-day, the wonderful growth of the country. We find this to be a fact that in 1860 our population was 31,443,321, and to-day by the present census it is 76,303,387.

I call attention to the census of 1860 because it was in 1861 that Kansas was admitted as a State of the Union. Then the population was 31,443,321, and it is now over 76,000,000. Here has been a growth of nearly 45,000,000, more than double the population in 1861, when we were insisting that we would admit a State only upon her possessing the unit of representation, which at that time was, I think, 127,000.

Now, look for a moment at our resources. In 1860 the resources of this country were $16,159,616,068—something over $16,000,000,000—and in 1890, as to which we have definite and certain returns of the census, our resources were $65,037,091,197, and carried along with the same development and increase, which, I submit, is a fair statement, to-day we have nearly or quite one hundred billions of wealth in this country. If so, should not the standard by which Territories are admitted into this Union be in some measure increased over the ratio of representation that was fixed with reference to Kansas?

Reference has been made, I think by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], to Tennessee and to the fact that President Washington referred at the time to that State as admitted of right because of its population. It is a matter of fact, I understand, that Congress by the act of May 26, 1790, applied the ordinance of 1787 to the territory south of the Ohio, the government to be similar to that of the Northwest Territory. The meaning of that was that all the privileges, immunities, and rights which belonged to the inhabitants of the Northwest Territory were given to those south of the Ohio River, which included the then Territory of Tennessee. So that the Territory of Tennessee came in expressly under the ordinance of 1787.

With reference to Oregon the same fact applied; that is, in the organic law, as I am informed, the rights, privileges, and immunities that were given in the ordinance of 1787 to the Northwest Territory were given to the inhabitants of Oregon, and they came into the Union as a matter of right under those conditions.

To-day New Mexico asks for admission into the Union. With a population less than one-eighth of the average population of our States; with barely enough people to entitle her to one Representative in Congress, she asks not only for that Representative but for two Senators, with power equal to that of the greatest State in our National Senate, and for three Presidential electors.

We are, I believe, to consider not only the interests of these Territories, but the greater interests of the whole Republic. Whatever may have been the action of Congress in the past, we are to meet the question of to-day in the light that is now given us. We are to remember that statehood means more to-day than ever before, that it is not unreasonable but eminently just and fair to insist upon a higher standard for admission into our Union of States, now that our population, our resources, our power and prestige at home and abroad, have been so marvelously increased.

We believe that if no other question than that of population were involved in determining whether or not New Mexico is entitled to statehood, the decision must be against her admission, but another and most important question is as to the character of that population.

In what I may say here I have no purpose to vilify or slander the people of that Territory. They are part of our common country and they are entitled to our favor and our consideration. Surely they are entitled to our fair judgment, and nothing should be said by way of hostility or unreasonable opposition; but I submit that here and in the other House up to a recent time we have heard only from those who favored the admission of these Territories, only from those who naturally, as any of us would do, take a rose-colored view of their condition. I believe it was not fully understood until the committee visited these Territories just what the internal conditions were; this information could only be obtained by such an investigation as was made by the subcommittee. During that visit the committee diligently and faithfully pursued its work; it learned all it could, and I submit it brought back in its report nothing but what was established by the proven facts; nothing that was inspired by prejudice or by any unworthy motive.

So, then, what I may say about the character of these people will be said with no feeling of pleasure or gratification but rather with sincere regret. I believe the truth should be stated here, and that we should know what not all of us have understood, the peculiar conditions of that Territory.

We find everywhere throughout the Territory, in common language, in the universal expressions of her people, that the population is divided into two classes—Americans and Mexicans. Germans, Swedes, Irish, and those of all other nationalities are called "Americans," while the term "Mexican" is applied to those of Spanish and Mexican descent. This was everywhere so understood. Every witness who came before the subcommittee and was questioned with reference to this race division responded with the full knowledge and understanding that there were two distinct and separate classes of people occupying that Territory.

This division into two classes is a significant fact. It shows that the Mexican element is regarded as distinct from all other races, and is some evidence that it has never assimilated to any noticeable extent with Americans or those of other nationalities. During all the years of its occupation, covering centuries of time, the Mexican race has remained distinct. It has, I believe, in large measure adhered to its ancient customs and habits, beliefs and occupations. It has been wanting in enterprise, activity, and energy, and in that progressive spirit which is essential to good citizenship and to the building up of a successful State. Not until the coming of the Americans and their occupation do we find in that Territory any substantial evidence of moral, material, or political advancement, and whatever has since been done along progressive lines has been largely accomplished by Americans who have settled there.

It is true that among the Mexicans there may be found some who by reason of superior advantages, better education, greater ability, and higher ambitions have attained distinction in many of the walks of life, but their number has not been sufficient to change the general characteristics of their race.

An effort was made by the committee to ascertain in the places visited the proportionate number of Americans and Mexicans—a fact which it is known we were not able to obtain definitely from the census returns. The judges of courts, whose duties call them to the several counties in their districts, census enumerators, whose business would give them much information, and others who had special means of knowledge were inquired of as to the relative numbers in these race divisions, and I desire to present a part of this testimony.

At Las Vegas Chief Justice William J. Mills was called and in answer to inquiries stated in substance that the population of his judicial district, the fourth, was made up largely of Mexicans.

In San Miguel County, the largest in the district, there are about 15,000 Mexicans and 6,000 Americans, the Americans being located to a great extent in the towns. Mora County very largely predominates in Mexicans. In Union and Guadalupe counties, also, the Mexican element is far in excess, aggregating five-sixths of the total population in the latter county before the railroad was put through. In Colfax County alone the Americans have a majority.

It will thus be seen that, on an average, at least two-thirds of the population of Judge Mills's district is of Spanish or Mexican descent.

I will also bring to your attention the statements of the first six of the twenty or more enumerators who appeared before the committee.

I take, then, the first judge who appeared before the committee, and I take the first six of these enumerators. Pablo Ulibarri said, in reply to questions put to him through the official interpreter, that his district, embracing Placientas, 15 miles north of Las Vegas, contained about 2,500 people. Of these, 95 per cent spoke Spanish, although 65 per cent of that number could make themselves understood in English. (P. 14.)

Diamo Deo Sena, who took the census in San Miguel, stated that of the 800 people in his district only 25 spoke English. (P. 15.)

Of the 3,000 people in old Las Vegas, contained in the district covered by José Lino Rivera, practically all spoke Spanish. (P. 16.)

Eugenio Rudolph, an enumerator in one of the country districts northwest of Las Vegas, stated that 20 per cent of the population might be Americans. (P. 19.)

Pablo Jaramillo, whose district embraced Upper Las Vegas, Las Vigiles, and Las Vegas Hot Springs, with a total of some 500, stated that more than 50 per cent were Mexicans. (P. 20.)

While these statements are not all that were taken and, covering only a limited territory, are necessarily imperfect and incomplete, still we were enabled by this and other testimony to form some impression as to the race divisions, and to determine the fact that in a majority of the counties the Mexicans predominate.

From the census of 1900 we are not able to ascertain the number of Mexicans in the Territory, but from the report of the Governor to the Secretary of the Interior for 1902 we take the statement to be found on page 4. The Governor of the Territory makes an estimate of the population largely in excess of the returns of the Census Bureau, but I give the figures just as they appear in his report:

> There are in the Territory about 144,000 descendants of the original Spanish and Mexican settlers, and about 90,000 people who have come or whose parents on both sides came from the States since the date of the so-called American occupation, some fifty-two years ago. There are 12,700 Indians here, about 9,200 being Pueblo, living in village communities of their own, while the remainder are Apache, living on the Jicarilla and Mescalero Indian reservations, and Navaho on the Navaho reservation.

By this statement from the Governor of the Territory it appears that eight-thirteenths of the population, exclusive of Indians, are descendants of the original Spanish and Mexican settlers.

The total population according to the census of 1900 is 195,310. Of this number, taking the proportion as stated by the Governor, there would be in the Territory 75,120 Americans and 120,190 Mexicans, an excess of 45,070, while the excess of the latter class if the estimate of population made by the Governor is correct would be 54,000.

While the Governor, as we submit, is not correct in his estimate of the total population, yet it is reasonable to infer that, being a native and always a resident of the Territory, he would state with a reasonable degree of certainty the ratio between the two races.

USE OF SPANISH.

It is important to know whether these people, who constitute so large a majority of the inhabitants of the Territory, still adhere to ancient customs and still use the Spanish language.

The investigation made by the subcommittee disclosed the fact that, although this Territory has been a part of the United States for more than half a century and although these people have been living under our laws during this long period of time, the prevailing language among them all is Spanish.

The older men and women can speak nothing else. The younger to some extent have learned our language and, when obliged to, make use of it. Living in a separate part of each city or in country districts, they associate together almost exclusively, and have been and are to-day a distinct class. Among themselves, in their own homes and in their social and business relations with each other, they use with few exceptions the language of their Spanish or Mexican ancestry.

While the number who can, if necessary, speak English has been increased during the past decade, still the census shows that of the total population 10 years of age and over 11.4 per cent are unable to speak our language. In Oklahoma there are only 1.8 per cent and in the Indian Territory only 2.9 per cent who can not speak English.

Now, it has been remarked that these people are able to speak both languages. Of course this can be no objection, but I submit that these people are not linguists and that the mass of them understand but very little English, and there are certainly 11 or 12 per cent of them who can not speak English at all.

INTERPRETERS, JURIES, AND COURTS.

From the judges of their courts and court officials we learn that an interpreter is appointed in every district, who holds an office established by law and draws an annual salary. His services are almost indispensable in every county, and that we have from the testimony of the judges who hold court in the different counties. At each session of court he interprets the testimony of witnesses, the instructions of the court to the jury, and the arguments of counsel. It also appears in the evidence taken by the subcommittee that occasionally this interpreter is required to attend upon the deliberations of the jury when they retire to consult and make up their verdict.

Such a practice or even the occasional presence of an interpreter in the jury room must be condemned by all who are interested in our courts and in the proper administration of law and who regard the jury room as a place that belongs exclusively and sacredly to the jury while deliberating upon the questions submitted to them. Such an anomaly in court proceedings could not fail to attract attention; and the necessity that exists for such services by an interpreter discloses to some extent the fact that Mexicans who can not speak the English language are accustomed to serve as jurymen.

Mr. C. M. Foraker, United States marshal for the district of New Mexico and an intelligent gentleman familiar with the Territory, furnished to the committee copies of the pay rolls of grand and petit jurors during the year 1900 for the third United States judicial district. From these copies it appears that during the quarter ending December 31, 1900, 12 out of 30 grand jurors, and for the same quarter 13 out of 29 of the petit jurors, in this district could not write their names and signed these pay rolls by a mark. (Pp. 262–267).

In the course of his testimony Mr. Foraker further stated that in one case there was a grand jury of 21 and that 19 of them signed by a mark, and in another case a petit jury of 24 where 21 could not write their names. (P. 76.)

In a letter to Hon. GEORGE W. RAY, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, from Hon. John W. Griggs, Attorney-General of the United States, dated December 15, 1900, reference is made to the evils of the jury system in New Mexico and to the provisions of a bill whose passage he recommended. He says:

> The provision that jurors shall understand the English language is very important. Although New Mexico has been a Territory for fully fifty years, it is the exception to find among the jurors selected for service in the United States courts any who can understand the English language. Consequently the Government is under heavy expense annually in the employment of interpreters.
> The population of the Territory is largely of Mexican descent, and they are anxious to serve as jurors, while the (so-called) American element endeavor to escape jury duty. Reference to the pay rolls of jurors in the first and second districts, composed largely of Mexicans, shows that many of them are unable to write their own names. (P. 76.)

Whatever may be said of the character of these people as jurors by those who see only one side of the question, it should be evident to all that great causes involving life, liberty, property rights, and matters of the highest concern can not safely or properly be submitted to a tribunal so densely ignorant that nearly one-half of its members are unable to write their own names.

Jurors are selected men and would naturally come from the better educated and more intelligent in each community. If this is the condition of their jury system and such men as these are regarded as their qualified jurors, ought not the schools and the American immigration to exercise their elevating influence for a longer period of time, until jurors in that Territory, who present indictments or hear and determine great causes, can read documentary evidence that may be submitted to them and write their own names?

Several justices of the peace were called before the committee in different places and were asked to present their records and give information as to the method of conducting business in their courts. As a rule jurors were not required, but occasionally they were summoned. The only jury list of which we were informed gave the following names: Pedro Triego, president; Fabriar Gallegos, Antonio Maria, Pedro Grego, José Ulibarri, and Luis Pino. All were evidently the names of Mexicans.

The records were generally found to be kept in Spanish, and the testimony given before these courts as a rule required the services of an interpreter. Even some of the justices who appeared before the committee were unable to speak English, and the assistance of an interpreter was required to make their statements understood.

It would seem reasonable to expect, if this is a progressive people, that the judges who hold such courts would be able to speak the language of our country.

Unable to read the laws of the Territory in English, they were conveniently supplied with a Spanish translation.

Census enumerators, some of whom were obliged to have an interpreter, testified to the general use of the Spanish language in the country districts and in certain precincts of the cities; and the fact that a majority of the enumerators were of that race, and that Americans were assisted by thirteen interpreters, is some evidence of the language that prevails in New Mexico.

SPANISH IN THE SCHOOLS.

From the testimony of teachers in the public schools it was ascertained that in many localities nearly all the Mexican pupils, upon entering the lowest grades, speak nothing but Spanish; that in the larger schools English and Spanish (p. 27) are taught, while in some districts it was said that Spanish is used exclusively. The reason given for this was "the paucity of teachers." In the high schools Spanish is taught to enable the graduates to instruct in that language and to transact business. The Mexican pupils in some localities never enter the high school, but leave their studies at some lower grade. It is said of them that (P. 24) "they learn to write and learn to draw, but it is very hard to teach them English well." When engaged in play and at their homes it appeared in evidence that these Mexican children generally use the Spanish language, and when they leave the schools the tendency among them is to go back to the common use of that language.

POLITICAL CAMPAIGNS.

Inquiry was made to ascertain whether the speeches delivered during political campaigns were given in English or Spanish, and it was found that in many counties only the foreign language was spoken, while in other places both languages were used.

When election day comes, American ballots will not answer for all the voters of the Territory, but some must be printed in another language. It is doubtless true that many of their officials have been elected by these foreign ballots, and by voters who could determine their meaning and the political party for which they were prepared only by some sign or emblem conspicuously placed upon the ballot.

In the political conventions of both parties an interpreter is necessary, and during the nominating speeches this assistant is always at hand to repeat in another language the laudatory and eloquent address of the advocate of each nominee. When the present Delegate from the Territory was nominated at Raton, October 10, 1902, José D. Sena acted as interpreter. He stated before the committee that Mr. Maortez was appointed interpreter on the floor, that his voice gave out, and that he, Mr. Sena, took his place. The nomination of Mr. RODEY was made by a gentleman in English. Mr. Sena interpreted this, and he also interpreted the speeches seconding Mr. RODEY'S nomination. (P. 32.)

So, too, in the legislative assemblies of the Territory, in both the council, which corresponds to a senate, and in the house of representatives, an official interpreter is required for the transaction of business.

I have heard the assertion made that so far as the senate is concerned it is altogether unnecessary; that there is no occasion for interpreters to translate from one language to another the statements of its members. But it is a little singular, that interpreters should be continued in office year after year for no other purpose, as appears by the statement referred to, than to entertain the spectators. It is hardly creditable to their senate or to their people that this should be done as a mere matter of entertainment. The taxpayers' money is being paid to those interpreters, and it would seem if they were not necessary they would not be constantly employed.

I believe, however, it is a fact that among the men who are elected to these assemblies there are those who can not speak or understand the language of our country, but must have the assistance of an interpreter.

Is that Territory quite prepared for statehood where so many of its people, where justices of the peace, delegates to great conventions, officials, and legislators are unable to speak or understand the English language?

EDUCATION IN NEW MEXICO.

I will now call the attention of the Senate to the past and present educational conditions of the Territory.

To my mind this is an important consideration. I wish to trace the development along educational lines, though at some length, and I want to show what has been the growth and development during the earlier Mexican occupation and what has happened in later years. In Bancroft's History of the Pacific States, page 643, referring to the period from 1850 to 1860, during our earliest occupation and when there were very few Americans there, it is stated that—

Nowhere in the United States was popular education in so lamentable a condition as in New Mexico during this period.

Here had been a Mexican occupation for several centuries, and that was the condition we found at the time our occupation began.

Bancroft continues:

Of the population in 1850, the census showed a total of 25,085 adults and in 1860 of 32,785 who could not read or write, and the correct figures would doubtless have been considerably larger. * * * There were practically no public schools at all.

It is further stated that certain persons of considerable authority used their influence against any common school system, but that Territorial officials and leading citizens realized the importance of educating the masses.

The historian continues:

Several memorials were sent to Congress asking for money aid in place of the usual land appropriations, which as yet could not be utilized. * * * In 1859-60 an act of the legislature provided for a school in each settlement, to be supported by a tax of 50 cents for each child, the justice of the peace to employ a teacher and require attendance from November to April, and the probate judge to act as county superintendent. This was the system for many years with but very slight modification (p. 643).

From a note on page 774 of the same history I would quote these items:

1866. The various statutes (relating to schools) have no effect, but some activity in private schools.
1867. Act amending and perfecting school systems; probate judges to act as county superintendents.
1868. Still no schools, and no school tax collected, according to governor's message.
1871. In 4 counties, out of 5,053 votes only 37 were in favor of a law to support schools by taxation.

That was as late as 1871, when, let me repeat, in 4 counties, all told, only 37 votes favored public education at public expense.

1870. Total school attendance, according to census, was 1,889.

The population at that time, by the census, was 91,874. Less than 2,000 attended school out of a population of nearly 100,000.

1872. Act providing for county boards of 4 supervisors.
1875. Eight counties report 138 schools, 47 teachers, and 5,151 pupils, under law of '71, giving the schools one-fourth of tax and the poll tax.
1881. Education compulsory for five months per year.
1883. Governor reports not much progress under the system.
1884. Act establishing public schools, with an elective county superintendent, one or more schools in each district, under 3 directors, and a tax of 3 mills per dollar, with poll tax; school fund this year to be $100,000, or one-fourth of all taxes.

This would seem to be a substantial amount and would seem to indicate progress along educational lines, but in the text the author of this history, on pages 774 and 775, referring to a time between 1884 and 1888, states that education "has remained in a backward condition, notwithstanding the advanced views and earnest efforts of Territorial officials and of many citizens."

In 1880 (when the population was 119,565) there were only 162 schools, with an average attendance of 3,150 pupils. By acts of the legislature a public-school system was created and perfected at different dates from 1863 to 1884, when it assumed a tolerably effective form, in theory at least.

But this unprejudiced historian makes a further statement:

One-fourth of all taxes is devoted to education, but in the collection and application of the funds there have been great irregularities, on account of the apathy of the native population.
The cause of education has been retarded also by all the causes that have hindered progress in other directions.

The author in this connection names as one of the obstacles to educational progress the great preponderance of the Spanish element, and says that with the increase of immigration there is noted a constant, though slow, growth of a healthful sentiment in favor of schools, and encouraging progress is looked for in the future.

I would ask that consideration be given to this historian's unprejudiced opinions as to the causes of the neglect of public schools during a long period of time after the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. Was not this neglect due to the apathy, ignorance, and unprogressive spirit of the predominating Spanish and Mexican element?

When, however, the American immigration had begun to make a more noticeable and a more durable impression, when railroads extended over the territory, when capital had found larger investment, and enterprise and intelligence had obtained a greater influence over this people, then for the first time the public-school system received due attention, and a more complete and effective school law was placed upon the statute books. But this, let us all bear in mind, was not accomplished until the year 1891.

In the report of Hon. L. Bradford Prince, Governor of New Mexico, dated October 12, 1891, referring to the school law passed at a session of the Territorial legislature and approved February 12, 1891, it is stated:

Preeminent in their importance are the acts relating to public education. The public-school system of the Territory has been very defective. While it can not be expected that a system equal to those of most of the States can be maintained in the absence of a school fund, and the portion of the public domain set apart for that purpose is not available without Congressional action, which thus far has been refused, yet very much is accomplished by the series of acts passed by the late legislature.
Chapter 25, "An act establishing common schools, etc.," is intended to provide a complete system of public schools throughout the Territory. It unifies the whole by creating a Territorial superintendent of public instruction and a Territorial board of education.
It provides for a uniform series of text-books, and for their purchase at the lowest rates; for the examination of teachers; for the incorporation of school districts; for the erection of schoolhouses; and, generally, for the efficient conduct of the schools.
To meet the necessary expenses it authorizes a Territorial tax of 3 mills, a district tax of 5 mills, and the bonding of districts for specified purposes by a vote of the people. In addition to all this, all poll taxes, fines, forfeitures, and all licenses paid by liquor dealers, etc., go to the school fund.
The passage of this act was looked upon as a very important step in the progress of the Territory, and was the cause of general rejoicing. * * * Taken altogether, the acts passed relative to public instruction at this session constitute the most important and progressive legislation that New Mexico has ever known. * * *
As mentioned under the head of "Legislation," the crowning work of the late legislature was that relative to public education.

And here the Governor makes this further statement:

For the first time a regular system has been instituted, with an official head. While the laws are not yet perfect, yet they are far in advance of those which they superseded in every respect.

From that time we can date the beginning of greater progress in improving and elevating the mental, moral, and material condition of the people. The time since then has been brief, a little more than ten years, and, although much has been accomplished in this short period, yet the great work along educational lines is still before them.

In this connection I wish to add the statement of a citizen of Las Cruces, who came voluntarily before the committee while engaged in a hearing at that place. I desire to say of this man that I was informed by one whom I knew and in whom I had perfect confidence that his statements were thoroughly to be relied upon; that he was a man of intelligence, a man of substance, a man acquainted with the Territory and conditions there, and that his statements were to be believed. His name has been mentioned before in this discussion—Martinez Amador, a farmer, 64 years of age, who was born in the Republic of Mexico and came to Las Cruces when 9 years of age, and has lived there ever since. He said, in answer to inquiries, that his farm was near the Rio Grande and that he farmed by irrigation entirely. I offer now other questions and his answers:

Q. Is your farm all watered regularly?
A. No, sir; we have been suffering a great deal for water. Since the railroad came here there is so much population above, it cuts all our water here. We have been suffering, and we lose our farms, and we lose a good many thousand dollars on that account. I have a good deal of a farm here myself. I got here 300 acres of land and I can not raise nothing on account of water. I lose my orchard, and lose nearly the whole thing.

This applies to another matter, but I wish to read it.

Q. How far do you live from town?
A. I live here in this city. That place where you eaten your dinner to-day, that is my residence, right on this side.

CAN NOT DEPEND ON RAIN.

Q. The committee understands that farming can not be done away from the streams?
A. Well, in this country it is very dry. They won't raise nothing if there is no water from the river, you know; we can not depend on rains at all; it don't rain here enough.
Q. And the committee understands from other witnesses that stock raising is possible 5 miles from the water hole or water stream; is that correct?
A. Yes, sir. Well, they all get the water up there in the mountains in the springs, but it ain't been enough water to water a big stock of cattle.

Here is the particular point to which I wish to direct attention:

NATIVES NOT READY FOR STATEHOOD.

Q. Is there any statement which you want to make to the committee?
A. Well, I want, if you will allow me, to make a statement about our population. My people all belong to the Mexican race. They come from old Mexico, and I think our people is not able now to support statehood, because most of the people here is ignorant; and I do not think we are ready to support statehood yet for about ten years, until our children grow up. We got good schools now, and we send our children to school, and they doing well; but the old residents are mostly Mexicans, you know. You take them in the election time, and you take them what you call, the emblem; they go by that, and they do not know who they vote for. They do not know who is on the ticket—the majority of that kind of people. As a consequence, I think there is one great fault of our people—they have not got education; the old timers; the old timers like me. I never been in the schools, except the primary schools, you know, but I been picking up here and there to know just the little I know now, and that is about all; but I never been in the schools. My children are all well educated. They have been to school in St. Louis and they have been in the schools here. My children, they are able to support statehood and compete with the majority as far as people, you know, but the others, I am very sorry to say it, they are not able to do that.
(The remainder of the questions propounded to the witness, and the answers thereto, were made through the medium of the official interpreter of the committee.)

"MANY DO NOT KNOW WHAT STATEHOOD IS."

Q. What is the feeling of the people, the native Mexicans out in the country, like yourself, about this subject?
A. There are a good many that do not know what statehood is. They do not know the difference between a State and a Territory. The greater part of them do not know how to write or read.
Q. You live out in the country; now, in the campaigns are there speeches made out there to your people?
A. Yes; they have some speeches, but it is always in Spanish when they have campaign speeches. Sometimes they speak in English, and then they have an interpreter to interpret it to them.
And further the witness saith not.

Mr. President, I now wish to call attention to the census returns of 1900, and to the facts stated therein bearing upon the question of illiteracy.

ILLITERACY.

Out of a population 10 years of age and over, numbering 141,282, the census shows that 46,971, or 33.2 per cent, are illiterates, and 41,119, or 29.1 per cent, can neither read nor write.

Is that Territory quite prepared for statehood when nearly one-third of its population 10 years of age and over are illiterates, and when over 11 per cent can not speak the English language?

For the purpose of showing the comparative illiteracy of other States and Territories I submit a list of all those designated in the census as belonging to the Western Division, and the per cent of illiteracy of each in the year 1900. The figures are for all native and foreign-born males of voting age.

	Per cent.
Oklahoma	5.9
Montana	6.1
Wyoming	4.3
Colorado	4.1
Utah	3.7
Nevada	12.8
Idaho	5.4
Washington	3.4
Oregon	4.8
California	6.2
Arizona	25.4
New Mexico	28.3

By this statement the true condition of New Mexico in this regard and her relative rank among the States we have named are made apparent.

From this large number of male illiterates of 21 years of age and over must come nearly, if not quite, one-fourth of her voters. Her per cent is nearly five times as great as that of Oklahoma and more than eight times that of Washington.

In the census of 1900, page cxii, Volume II, Part II, it is stated that—the large proportion of illiterates shown for New Mexico is due, in part, to the large number of illiterates among the native white population of Spanish descent and also to the illiterate among its foreign white and colored population.

But, leaving out the foreign white and colored people, we find that the per cent of illiterates among the native white male population of native parentage 10 years of age and over is 21.9, and of females of the same class the percentage is 41. In Oklahoma the corresponding per cents are, for males, 2.7, and for females, 2.5.

The facts given in these statements establish beyond question the sad state of illiteracy existing among the Territory's inhabitants of Mexican descent, a class that is enabled by its large majority, whenever practically united, to control the public school system, taxation, and all other affairs of the Territory, except in those matters where Congress has some supervision, and which, if at the present time statehood should be granted, would control the choice of governor, judges of courts, Representatives in Congress, two Senators, and the Presidential electors.

Under these conditions is it unreasonable to ask that this large per cent of illiteracy among the people of Spanish and Mexican descent in New Mexico be greatly reduced and her population become more Americanized before the privilege of statehood is granted?

Territories have been admitted with a population manifestly too small to entitle them to this privilege, but assurances were given that in a brief period of time immigration would give them the requisite number of inhabitants. Their resources and future prospects were described in glowing terms by enthusiastic advocates of statehood. Unfortunately, these promises and predictions have not always been found truthful and correct. Subsequent events have not always justified them, and the only basis upon which statehood can be rightfully claimed, is the existing status and development.

RESOURCES OF NEW MEXICO—HER HISTORY.

I would now call attention to the past, present, and prospective resources of New Mexico, and, for a better understanding of their development, I wish to give you a brief résumé of the history of the Territory.

The name of the earliest discoverer or explorer of New Mexico is in doubt. By some historians this honor is claimed for Cabeza de Vaca and by others for Friar Marcus de Niza, a Franciscan monk.

The date of discovery is also uncertain. It is said, however, on good authority, that Friar Marcus, as the first discoverer, visited the Zuñi Pueblos in June, 1539.

In 1540 Coronado, a name still familiar to New Mexicans, guided by the same friar, entered this country and occupied Cibolo or Zuñi. He subsequently explored, through reconnoitering parties, and annexed the Moqui country, to the west, and the Acoma and Tegua cities, on the Rio Grande, near the site of the present city of Albuquerque.

During this expedition Coronado arrived at Bernalillo, on the Rio Grande, in December, 1540, and the Pecos and Galisteo basins were also annexed. Further explorations were made from time to time, and other places were added to the dominion of Spain. The adventurers must have found the cliff dwellings of a departed race and the homes of the Pueblo or village Indians, a description of which I wish to give.

These mighty and famous communal houses were built on some point of importance, not only for defensive purposes but to overlook the country. They were constructed in the form of squares, with inside courts or plazas, all the apartments having their entrances on the plaza, and the building itself is reared to a height of six or eight stories, made of well-laid masonry. So good was their structure that many of them, although long abandoned, remain in good preservation until this day. Others that have been constantly inhabited are as good as when discovered. (Frost's Bureau of Immigration, published in 1894 at Santa Fe, p. 326.)

These wonderful houses of six or eight stories in height contrast in a remarkable way with the one-story adobe houses of very many of the Mexican people now residing in this Territory.

In 1597 Don Juan de Oñate entered New Mexico with 700 soldiers and 130 families for colonization, and a few years later, probably in 1605, a settlement was made at Santa Fe. From that date until 1680 this was the only European settlement of note.

In 1680 occurred the Pueblo revolution when Governor Otermin, with his soldiers and 1,000 women and children, were beseiged in the "Old Palace," still standing on the north side of the plaza in Santa Fe. During that year the Spaniards were driven out of the country and the Pueblos retained control until 1692. They prohibited the use of the Spanish language and the planting of grains and seeds that had been introduced by their former conquerors, and took great pains to destroy every vestige of Spanish mines.

In 1692 de Vargas reconquered the Territory and from that time until 1800 24 different governors ruled in the old palace at Santa Fe.

The first American to penetrate New Mexico is said to have been a trader by the name of Baptiste Le Laude, who came in 1804. Two years later Lieutenant Pike erected a fort and raised the American flag for the first time in that Territory, but he was on Mexican soil and was placed under arrest, sent to Santa Fe and then to the City of Mexico.

In 1812 a party of St. Louis merchants, under the command of Mr. McKnight, entered New Mexico from the northwest. They were arrested as spies, their goods confiscated, and themselves sent south to follow Pike. They were held as prisoners until Mexico was liberated by Iturbide from the Spanish Crown.

Other adventurous traders followed, and then commenced an era of romance. The "commerce of the prairies" was begun, and the famous Santa Fe trail was opened, with Westport, now a part of Kansas City, Mo., and Santa Fe as the outposts of the American and Spanish civilizations. This trail was not, however, permanently opened until 1822.

From that date until 1843 the trade increased so that on one occasion 350 men and 230 wagons, loaded with $450,000 worth of goods at first cost, were transported in one caravan.

In 1837 a rebellion resulted in the election of Gonzales, a Pueblo Indian, as Governor, but he was soon defeated and overthrown by Armijo, who had been appointed governor by the Mexican authorities.

Armijo was the last Mexican Governor. He was in authority when Gen. S. W. Kearny, with a small army, came down from the north, captured Las Vegas, and then pushed on to Santa Fe. This town surrendered without opposition, and on the 22d of August, 1846, General Kearny raised the American flag in the plaza and declared New Mexico to be a part of the United States. He at once established a Territorial government and appointed as Governor Charles Bent, together with other necessary officials. Bent did not long survive, for while at Taos to quell a disturbance he was killed by a mob of Mexicans and Pueblo Indians.

Other American Governors succeeded him. In 1851 James S. Calhoun was appointed Governor. He was for some time unfitted by illness to perform his official duties and died in June, 1852, on his way to the States. Col. E. V. Sumner, the military commander, in the absence of the secretary, took charge of civil affairs until the arrival of Governor Lane, in September of that year.

Here I wish to insert from the report of Colonel Sumner a brief statement showing the condition in which the Territory was when our American occupation began, and the view that was taken not only by this distinguished military leader, afterwards noted in the Civil War, but by our then Secretary of War.

Colonel Sumner, in his report of May, took a very unfavorable view of the country and its prospects. No civil government emanating from the United States could be maintained without the Army, making it virtually a military goverment, costly and burdensome to the nation, without helping the New Mexicans, who would become only the more worthless the more public money was spent in the country.

"Withdraw all the troops and civil officers," was his advice, "and let the people elect their own civil officers and conduct their government in their own way under the general supervision of our Government. It would probably assume a similar form to the one found here in 1846, viz, a civil government but under the entire control of the governor. This change would be highly gratifying to the people. There would be a pronunciamiento every month or two, but these would be of no consequence, as they are very harmless when confined to Mexicans alone."

The Secretary of War (Charles M. Conrad) went a step further and suggested the buying of all New Mexican property, either for money or in exchange for other lands, and abandoning the Territory as much cheaper than employing a military force at an annual cost of nearly half the total value of real estate. And, indeed, it would have been cheaper in dollars if humanity, civilization, and treaty rights might have been disregarded. (Bancroft's History, pp. 632, 633.)

Down to the opening of the Civil War there were no events of general interest except the campaigns against Navahos and Apaches by United States troops and New Mexican volunteers.

From 1861 to 1865 the Territory was engaged in fighting the Indians and in guarding the frontier against Confederate and Mexican inroads and attacks. Indian wars continued until 1886.

The development of New Mexico under American control really began with the introduction of railroads in 1880. At that time, from all that can be ascertained, few Americans were residing in the Territory.

Under the treaty (of Guadalupe Hidalgo, article 8) citizens of New Mexico might leave the Territory or remain either as citizens of the United States or of Mexico, but such as should not within one year make known their choice were to become citizens of the United States. * * * It was estimated that in 1848-49 the Territory thus lost only about 1,200, though in 1850 a considerable number of wealthy hacendados withdrew with their peones and possessions to Chihuahua. (Bancroft's History, p. 472.)

The great mass of the Mexican people remained in the Territory, and their numbers would account for nearly the whole population as given in the census of 1880.

The history of the Territory from that date, in respect to those matters that are of importance in this discussion, has been or will be referred to.

Mr. Max. Frost, secretary of the local bureau of immigration, in his history of New Mexico and its resources, from which I have before quoted, states that—

It is since the advent of railroads that the real progress of New Mexico has begun. In 1880 it was a frontier country. Its resources were absolutely unknown except to a few adventurous spirits, and there were no towns of any size or importance except Santa Fe (p. 339).

Certainly at that time there could have been but little progress or development and but few Americans residing there.

In our visit to the chief cities of the Territory we found the evidence of two distinct civilizations. Here were good business blocks and hotels, fine residences, and the appearance of thrift and enterprise. That was in the American part of the city. A little way distant were adobe houses of a single story, a few stores in mud buildings, with foreign signs, and a general condition that would result from neglect, ignorance, and a purpose to adhere to ancient customs and modes of living. That was the Mexican quarter.

In these cities we met with Americans who were well educated, intelligent, cultivated and refined, and the peers of any to be found in the States. Here were men engaged in the professions, business men, owners of ranches, farms, and mines, and others who were types of the best citizenship; but the true representatives of the majority of the people in the Territory were not conspicuous. A few only were present, and these were evidently men of high character and ability. The average Mexican, the true representative of his race, as we understood it, did not appear at interviews or receptions. Perhaps he was not interested in the statehood question.

A visit to some of the schools disclosed a commendable condition where American pupils predominated, and in others an earnest effort was evidently being made to instruct and improve those pupils who at home and in their play spoke another language.

While on our journey from city to city, we passed over immense tracts of land, sometimes extending as far as the eye could reach, that seemed like a dreary, worthless waste. The wild grasses that grew thereon were brown and sere, but it is said that within 5 miles of water courses or other supplies of water this land is useful for grazing.

Long ranges of mountains with lofty peaks, towering far above the plains were generally visible. Huge formations, like the battlements of a giant race, were often seen, while columns of stone, like cathedral towers, attracted our attention. To a stranger it is a wonderland by reason of its vast extent and its wondrous scenery of plain and mountain. As one rides the long distances over these desert lands he is impressed with the same thoughts that find expression in the poem of Joaquin Miller, entitled The Ship in the Desert. The "Poet of the Sierras" writes:

A wild, wide land of mysteries,
Of sea-salt lakes and dried-up seas,
And lonely wells and pools; a land
That seems so like dead Palestine,
Save that its wastes have no confine
Till push'd against the level'd skies.

Further along appears the following:

He look'd awest toward the plain;
Against the land of boundless space,
The land of silences, the land
Of shoreless deserts sown with sand,
Where Desolation's dwelling is;
The land where, wondering, you say,
What dried-up, shoreless sea is this?
Where, wandering, from day to day
You say, To-morrow sure we come
To rest in some cool resting place;
And yet you journey on through space,
While seasons pass, and are struck dumb
With marvel at the distances.

LACK OF RAINFALL—IRRIGATION.

Over all this land there is one desire that is universally expressed. It is like that of the fabled Tantalus, a cry for water. Nature has withheld from this great Territory the necessary supply of rain.

Located in the very midst of what was known in our school days and pictured on the maps as the Great American Desert, New Mexico has been hindered in all her attempts at progress by this universal want. It is said that her aridity arises partly from her location, partly from her altitude, and partly from her topography. The Gulf of Mexico and the Pacific Ocean are each about 500 miles distant, and when the winds and clouds reach New Mexico only the mountain chains and peaks can draw further moisture from them. The valleys and table-lands are left with only a scant supply. The average rainfall in the valleys of this Territory will not exceed an inch per month, and two-thirds of that supply falls during the summer months. In New York the average precipitation is 43 inches, in Boston 45, and in Savannah 48. (Report of Governor of New Mexico, 1902, p. 3.)

What has just been read is not my statement. It comes from one who would not misrepresent to the disadvantage of his own Territory. These are the words of the governor of that Territory. Further on——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I interrupt the Senator at this point to call attention to the fact that with the scanty rainfall in the Territory, where it is not mountainous, to which the Senator referred, even when it does fall, it falls in a torrential form; that is, in sharp showers, and it immediately runs off into little gullies or dries up. I think it is stated in the report of the governor of New Mexico himself that within an hour or two hours after the heaviest rainfall in summer time the ground is as dry as it was before the rain.

This fact I refer to because it shows that with the limited rainfall with which that country is endowed the rainfall itself can not be utilized except in the mountains, where it flows into streams, and it then may, and we hope in the future will, be retained by dams, catches, and other irrigation basins. That, however, is a thing for the future.

Mr. BURTON. May I interrupt just a moment to make an inquiry there? What is the rainfall in New Mexico?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from New Hampshire has just stated that the rainfall in New Mexico averages scarcely more than an inch per month, and he has given the figures showing the rainfall in other parts of the country.

Mr. BURTON. And what is necessary for a crop?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think the best answer to that is to give the approximate rainfalls in the States where crops are the usual thing and not the exception. It is from 28 to 30 and even 40 inches.

Now, I will go a little bit further and say to the Senator that even in India the rainfall on the coast in some places is 100 inches, and farther inland it is 70 and 60 inches, and on a line still farther inland it is 40 inches; that irrigation chiefly exists where the rainfall is as high as 20 inches per year, and that below that point in India land is considered absolutely desert and worthless.

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator will allow me further, is it not known now that rainfall is not as good for producing a crop as irrigation?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not know whether the Senator had the good fortune some of the rest of us had to be actually a farmer or not, and I pause, before stating what I am going to say, to ask whether he was one of these hard-handed farmer boys.

Mr. BURTON. I happened to be president of a company that built large canal in the Arkansas Valley for irrigation purposes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Therefore I can understand the Senator's enthusiasm for irrigation. But he asked me a question, and I am going to answer him from his own experience, provided he was a farmer's boy and knows anything about raising crops by hand. The Senator from New Hampshire has given the figures showing the rainfall in New Mexico. I have repeated them to the Senate. I ask the Senator, if he has had any experience in farming, whether or not he thinks that there is a sufficient rainfall in New Mexico to raise a crop.

Mr. BURTON. The rainfall in New Mexico, if preserved, even if it were only 12 inches, and it is a good deal more than that, would farm enough land to make it far more profitable than any country that has 30 inches of rainfall.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, I want to ask the Senator what——

Mr. BURTON. I will say more. One acre under irrigation is worth a half dozen acres outside, and there can not be any torrential rains so great but that the water can easily be controlled and conserved.

It has now been demonstrated by irrigationists that torrential rains do not interfere in any way with the conservation of the water. It is my opinion that we are merely on the fringes of the question of irrigation. We began it only a few years ago in this country. There is no part of the United States that does not furnish enough rainfall, if it is conserved, to make it a very profitable country for farming when they learn how to conserve the water. We are making more rapid advancement along that line now than on any other one question.

I will say, while I am on my feet, although I did not mean to go so far, that the greatest domestic question, perhaps, that will come before Congress in future years is the conservation of the rainfall. We have 19 inches of rain in the edge of Colorado. That is enough there, when it is conserved, to make it a very profitable country.

My own belief is that when attention is attracted to this question still further, as it will be, we shall see all of our arid country blossom as the rose.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, Mr. President, that is an instructive and, I may even say, a poetic speech, in which I note that the Senator makes two rather important statements. The first is incorrect. The second is correct, and I heartily agree with the Senator upon it, and congratulate him upon having made it.

Mr. BURTON. I am glad to know that I got one right.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, let us see whether or not I am correct in making that statement. The Senator has stated that he was speaking here rather as an expert upon the subject of irrigation. He announced to us that he was the president of the first irrigation company that took the waters of the Arkansas or some other river in Kansas.

Mr. BURTON. No; the Senator misunderstood me. It was not the first company.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, some company, no matter whether it was the first or not. I was trying to give the Senator the distinction of being a pioneer in this matter.

Mr. BURTON. No.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. At all events he followed in the footsteps of others, and he followed, according to his own admission, most ably in the footsteps of others.

Now, then, speaking of New Mexico, the Senator says that there are no torrential rains which can not be easily controlled. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that in the testimony taken by the subcommittee, which is before the Senator, and which, no doubt, he has carefully read, there is a statement concerning the great dam built at enormous expense, with all the appliances of modern improved science, in the Pecos River, having been washed out by just exactly these very torrential floods; and he will further find, if he will read—of course I have had no practical experience upon this point, though I have read with some care the books upon the subject of irrigation——

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will just as soon as I finish this statement.

The Senator will find that the great difficulty with the subject of irrigation is not to get the water out over the land when it has been impounded, but it is to hold these very torrential floods, which the Senator says can always be easily controlled. That is now the very great obstacle that stands in front of each effort of scientists upon the subject of irrigation.

Now I will hear the Senator.

Mr. BURTON. We are all of us interrupting the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM]. I do not desire to interrupt him, but I will state to the Senator from Indiana that the dam to which he referred as having been destroyed was destroyed because of the fact that the engineers did not take into account the way to prevent the immense floods from hitting it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Therefore it is not an easy matter, as the Senator says, is it?

Mr. BURTON. No; it is not an easy matter until it is learned. But you take the flood waters of the Missouri River, the flood waters of the Kaw, or the flood waters of the Arkansas——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Or of any other river——

Mr. BURTON. Or of any other stream that is swollen by torrential rains, and all you have to do is to find out the greatest of the floods, then dig and build artificial canals enough, and when the floods come lift up one headgate at a time and prevent the flood waters from striking the point where they will do damage.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. How can you tell that?

Mr. BURTON. For instance, it is known now what is the highest flood of the Arkansas and of the Missouri River.

Mr. HOAR. For how many years back?

Mr. BURTON. Perhaps for forty years back.

Mr. HOAR. That will not do.

Mr. BURTON. That is back far enough to make a pretty safe calculation. There is no danger, for instance, from this time on of floods in the Upper Arkansas, because of the ditches that have been built. The headgates would be lifted, the reservoirs being constructed, and the water would be impounded and conserved for agricultural purposes.

I say again that God Almighty sends no torrential rains that mankind is not able to control in order to be conserved for beneficial purposes.

It was thought for a long time, for instance, that we could do something to produce rain; that we could cause precipitation by bombarding the heavens; and Congress passed what was known as the timber-culture law, based upon a fallacy, based upon the idea that the rain belt was traveling west, when, as a matter of fact, there is no part of the world where the rainfall increases or decreases. Man can do nothing to make it rain or to prevent it from raining; he can not increase precipitation nor decrease precipitation, but he can conserve the water after it falls, and that, I believe, will be the great coming question—to conserve the water so as to prevent floods and utilize it for the benefit of man.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, we have heard from the Senator an engaging mixture of science and Divinity.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I just came into the Chamber and merely want to know whether it is the statehood bill which is under discussion.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes, it is; and in one of its very important aspects, I will say to the Senator. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM] had very kindly yielded to me to ask him a question, and then the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BURTON] even more kindly volunteered very interesting and varied information upon this subject, and we are now holding a little colloquy.

Mr. SPOONER. I desire to ask the Senator on what particular proposition is the debate proceeding in its relation to statehood?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will try to show the Senator. The Senator from New Hampshire——

Mr. HOAR. If I may make a suggestion, the proposition is the impossibility of restraining the floods, of which both Senators are giving a practical illustration. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And several other Senators. Mr. President, if both Senators combined can succeed in a certain kind of irrigation by their efforts, they will have accomplished more than they set out to accomplish.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say with reference to the scientific exposition we have heard from the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BURTON], that if he can accomplish the scientific things he says he can, he can earn a good deal more money as a civil engineer engaged in irrigation construction than he can as a Senator of the United States.

Mr. BURTON. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. Of course I could earn more money in a great many ways than I can as a Senator of the United States. I did not mean to have the Senator to imagine for a moment that we are getting as much salary as we are entitled to. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I admit that.

Mr. BURTON. The first vote I gave after I came here was to increase my salary. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But, Mr. President, I could put that in another way, though I do not want to. I could even say that the Senator's efforts, if he could successfully establish as a practical matter what he says here, would be more valuable to the country and to humanity than are his services as a Senator or those of any other Senator here, although I would not underestimate the services of the Senator——

Mr. BURTON. In what way would they be more valuable?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. By conserving the waters to prevent floods; and we are willing to take up such a bill as that if the Senator desires.

I started by saying that the Senator interrupted me, very courteously interrupted me, and in his interesting remarks made two statements, one correct and one incorrect. The incorrect one was that there were no torrential floods which were not easy of control. I venture to say, with even my limited knowledge of the science of irrigation, that the great difficulty that confronts and confounds the best scientific thought in the world upon this subject—for it is a world-wide subject—is just that question of controlling torrential floods. For example, the Committee on Territories, of which I have the honor to be chairman, has reported favorably to this Senate—and we ought to take it up and pass it, too—a bill authorizing Maricopa County, in Arizona—I will not go into the machinery of that bill—to issue certain bonds, if necessary, in order to construct a great impounding dam.

A model of that dam I have seen; it has been built in model and projected for the purpose of being built in reality by some of the ablest civil engineers perhaps that we have in this country: and yet there is in the mind of many of them a serious doubt whether that great work of science can do the very thing which the Senator says is the easiest matter in the world to do. Why, if it were an easy matter to control torrential floods the whole subject of irrigation would be very greatly simplified, and that beautiful day to which the Senator has poetically referred, would be here perhaps with the rising of to-morrow morning's sun. So the Senator, as a matter of fact, is incorrect when he says that it is an easy matter to control torrential rains and torrential floods.

I have in my room many books upon irrigation. Has the Senator read Newell's work and the reports of experiments in Egypt and India?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then how much would the Senator say that the great Assuan dam in Egypt cost? The Senator is familiar with the subject of irrigation, and as the president of an irrigation company he ought to be, and no doubt he is; so I will ask him how much that dam cost?

Mr. BURTON. I can not answer the question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will answer it for the Senator. That work alone cost $15,000,000 for the one dam for the purposes of irrigation. England has spent $150,000,000 for irrigation in India. There have been dams washed out; one was washed out in the Pecos River, if my recollection serves me aright. I incur no hazard in making the statement, because it is in the evidence, and of course I can be corrected if I am wrong. The great dam on the Pecos River, which was washed out by a torrential flood, cost something over $1,700,000, and I am not sure that it did not cost more than that. Every man who testified before the Senate committee upon the subject, every scientist, every person versed in the literature of irrigation, and every person having had experience on the subject of irrigation, will tell the Senator and the Senate and everybody else that the great difficulty of the question of irrigation is how to control torrential floods.

The Senator no doubt does not refer to torrential floods, because he says they are easily controlled; while it is one of the most serious matters, as I said before, which has puzzled the great engineers in the world. These floods come down suddenly; they come in great volume, and waves sometimes come down a foot and more than a foot high at a time in a narrow gorge, and how to make a dam withstand that enormous onslaught is a serious question. I suppose the Senator did not refer to this, but perhaps he referred to the reservoir system, sometimes called catch-basins.

Mr. SPOONER. I understood the Senator from Kansas to say there would be no more torrential floods.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I did not hear the Senator say there would be no more torrential floods coming; but I am not surprised if he did say it, because he said the good Lord had fixed it all up, and he knew what the good Lord intended upon that subject. So if the Senator says there are to be no more torrential floods, I am not quite willing to believe the Senator's inspiration upon that point.

Mr. BURTON. I do not know where the Senator got that idea.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I got it from the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

That brings me to another point, and I hope I shall have the attention of the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I had no notion to intervene in this debate, but I understood the Senator from Kansas to say that God would not permit any more torrential floods to come which could not be conserved by man, and jocularly I called the attention of the Senator from Indiana to that.

Mr. BURTON (in his seat). If I have a chance after the Senator concludes I shall reply.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators must rise when they address the Senate.

Mr. BURTON. I beg the President's pardon, but we get in the way here of just speaking a word or two in our seats. I certainly want to be very careful about observing the rules of the Senate. I did not mean to offend. I was, however, simply following the example of the old and experienced Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], who spoke from his seat just before I did.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So far as I am concerned, I welcome the Senator's interruption, and always when on my feet invite the interruption of any Senator who thinks I am making a misstatement or thinks he can throw light on the subject I am trying to discuss.

The Senator from Kansas said another thing. My mind is brought to it by the query of the Senator from Wisconsin. The Senator from Kansas said, with the moderation which characterizes him, that man could do nothing to increase the rainfall or decrease the rainfall.

The Senator certainly has never been in the timber districts of this country, because if he had been the Senator would know as a matter of practical experience that the destruction of forests seriously affects precipitations, and sometimes very seriously. The Senator shakes his head. There is simply, then, a question of a difference of opinion between us as to the facts, which can only be settled by a reference to the authorities and our own experience. I have had some experience myself on that subject. I have seen streams shrink because the forests had been cut down and there was not a retention of the waters; therefore there was not evaporation of the waters, and therefore there was not the consequent precipitation. If the Senator will consult any of the authorities, he will find that one of the arguments for the preservation of the forests of this country is that not only should the timber be conserved for itself, but because it conserves the rainfall.

So it is true that man can do something to prevent precipitation. The Senator nods his head and then shakes his head. It must be in agreement to my statement, but in denial of my logic.

Now I come to the Senator's remarks, which I think are entirely true, and very seriously and gravely important, and that is that we are only on the fringe of this great question of irrigation. Mr. President, that is true; that is the position of the Committee on Territories. We are on the fringe of it. We do not assert as a body, nor as individuals, that the time will never come when the waters, such as they are down there in those rivers, may not be cut off and distributed for the uses of man. We assert that that has not thus far been successfully accomplished. That is all. When the Senator asserts, and asserts truly, that we are only upon the verge of the great question of irrigation, he states almost with the precision of an epigram the position of the committee.

I say further that when we shall get beyond the fringe of the subject of irrigation, when we shall have accomplished the important work of successfully impounding the waters, of successfully catching and holding flood waters and of controlling torrential floods, and when those waters thus conserved are distributed over lands which, when watered, are fertile, then it may be that those lands down there in those Territories, in which we are interested as much as any other Senators upon this floor, will sustain a population which might entitle them to statehood.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. DUBOIS. Do I understand the Senator from Indiana to say that it has not been demonstrated that the waters can be successfully impounded and conserved for use at the proper season?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; the Senator does not understand me to say that. The Senator perhaps was not in the Chamber during the course of all our remarks.

Mr. DUBOIS. I heard the last remark, however, when the Senator stated that it had not been demonstrated, and that we were yet on the threshold of the irrigation problem.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; that is one sequence of this colloquy, which will show the Senator my exact position. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BURTON] had said that it was an easy matter to control the torrential floods, and I have taken some issue with the Senator upon that subject, to the effect that that was the great difficulty before engineering science upon this subject.

I then stated further that it was demonstrated by the fact of the washing out of the dam upon the Pecos River, and that there was a bill now before the Senate, which we ought to pass because it is a matter of immediate relief, for the impounding of the waters of Salt River down near Phoenix. I do not say that that has not been accomplished sometimes, but I say that I agree with the statement of the Senator from Kansas, made when the Senator from Idaho was not in the Chamber, that we were only on the edge of this great question of irrigation. That is true. Does the Senator mean to say that a method has now been discovered of successfully impounding the waters of any stream?

Mr. DUBOIS. I state distinctly that there are reservoirs in successful operation which impound the water.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And I distinctly agree with that statement.

Mr. DUBOIS. There are such now in my State, for instance. There has been no necessity up to within a year or two of impounding the water; but I am quite satisfied, now that the necessity has come, that we can impound it, as has already been done in Colorado and in other places. I think it has been demonstrated beyond any reasonable doubt that the waters can be impounded and conserved and distributed at the proper time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I ask the Senator why it has not been necessary to impound the waters heretofore?

Mr. DUBOIS. Because we had sufficient water for all of the lands which were taken up and being utilized, but now so much land has been taken up that at seasons when water is low there is not sufficient water to go around. By building these reservoirs we can put water into ditches which are already constructed, and at the proper time release the water and furnish the canals already built and others with the proper amount of water.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is to say, that the lands susceptible of immediate irrigation have already been occupied; and to enable a heavier population to come impounding now becomes necessary. That might be one reason; or will the Senator also state this as a reason, that there has been within a few years past a shrinkage in the volume of water in the rivers?

Mr. DUBOIS. Not at all. There has been no shrinkage of water.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator state that as an exception?

Mr. DUBOIS. I will state simply, in a few words, that the lands adjacent to streams which may easily be watered have been taken up, and there are now large tracts of land which can only be utilized by impounding, conserving, and distributing properly the water which goes to waste at flood seasons.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; and the reason that it has not been necessary to impound the water before is the reason the Senator has stated. I should think if that would be satisfactory to those of us who are in opposition, it would be satisfactory to the Senator. I asked the Senator whether or not it was not also on account of the shrinkage in the volume of water in the streams——

Mr. DUBOIS. Not at all.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And the Senator said it was not. I was surprised at that, because that constitutes an exception, for at Phoenix, for instance, as has been shown by the testimony of Professor Newell, there has been a very serious shrinkage in the volume of the water in the stream, and that there has been a shrinkage in the volume of water in streams elsewhere, even in the Mississippi Valley, is a matter of common observation, and the causes for it are well known.

So it happens, Mr. President, that down there in Arizona and also in portions of New Mexico, which the committee have seen with their own eyes, there is a land over which irrigation ditches exist, and yet where there is not water for them. Down in one of the best ranches near Phoenix, in Arizona, a ranch of almost 400 acres, owned by Mr. Fowler, who made a most impressive argument in favor of statehood down there, and who testified before the committee that he was able this year to irrigate but 40 acres out of nearly 400, and that he was able to do that only by paying taxes on 160 acres of water. So that there was a shrinkage there, and there is shrinkage elsewhere; and I supposed, of course, that the Senator's State was no exception.

Now, I return to what the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BURTON] said, and what I think is profoundly true, that we are on the verge of this great subject. When we get beyond the verge of it, Mr. President, then conditions will be created which will result in the establishment of homes upon lands now incapable of supporting human life. The Senator will not insist that this development has as yet occurred to a great extent in either New Mexico or Arizona.

I am sorry, Mr. President, to occupy so much time, and I beg pardon of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. I will wait until the Senator from Indiana gets through.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I had not any idea of consuming so much time when I asked the Senator from New Hampshire if I could interrupt him.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I did not expect to get into this debate at all, but it struck a question in which I have been deeply interested for years. So I ventured to ask the question that has brought out the statement from the chairman of the committee—and his statement has interested me very much—and I think it my duty especially to correct one statement which the Senator made that has been a popular idea, but is a fallacy.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. BURTON. That is, that the rain belt travels in any direction. The time was when we all thought in the West that the rain belt was traveling west. We have long since learned that that is a fallacy. After we had begun our investigations we discovered that the rainfall has neither increased nor decreased in any part of the globe.

The destruction of timber does not increase or decrease precipitation; the growth of timber does not either increase or decrease precipitation. The rain is the parent of the tree; the tree is not the parent of the rain. It is true that a growth of timber will act as a reservoir and conserve water, in a measure, when it falls, but it does not increase the rainfall one drop. Rain is made so high above the timber by the countercurrents of different temperatures of air that timber has nothing to do with it, and it is made so high above the surface that man can not do anything to affect it. Now, let us get that question out of the way.

The great question that confronts us is what shall we do with the water that falls. This country has spent millions upon millions of dollars to build levees on the Lower Mississippi River. When we have thoroughly exhausted this question in a practical way, I think we will never allow the flood waters to go down there at all, but we will build canals higher up and divert the flood waters so as to prevent the destruction down there, for nature made that stream big enough to carry off the water if it is allowed to infiltrate the land and go down in equal part three hundred and sixty-five days in the year. So that the conservation of water is the great coming question for us to try to settle in a practical way.

The Senator from Indiana seemed to get from me the idea that it was an easy and trifling thing to conserve torrential rainfalls.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator said "easy."

Mr. BURTON. When I said "easy," I used the term in a relative sense. I do not mean by that that it does not take a great deal of work and a great deal of expense.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. When the Senator said "easy," I supposed he meant easy.

Mr. BURTON. Well, if the Senator will allow me to explain exactly what I did mean——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. I mean that it is easy to know the method. We have discovered the method by which we can divert the water of torrential rains as well as the water that comes down slower, so as to catch it. It has cost a great deal of money to learn that. The construction of the dam in the Pecos Valley was an experiment, but that has taught a great many people interested in irrigation that the mistake was made in not going back farther up and building lateral ditches sufficient to prevent that great flow of water to the dam.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Conceding, for the sake of bringing our minds together upon this question, that what the Senator is saying is true—and I hope it is—that a method has been discovered of catching and retaining torrential floods, how long does the Senator say it would take, conceding that method can now be successfully started, to put it in operation so as to irrigate 5,000,000 acres on the streams mentioned—how long?

Mr. BURTON. It is impossible to say; but I will say to the Senator that it will be done very much sooner if New Mexico is admitted as a State than it will if it is left as a Territory.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I have heard that statehood has produced a great many things, but the Senator certainly will not say that statehood has any effect upon torrential floods.

Mr. BURTON. Certainly, it has this effect, it has an effect upon capital invested there.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does not the Senator know that capital invests for profit?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If there is a mine on one side of a State line and another on another side in a Territory, which is richer than the one in the State line, does the Senator mean to say that capital would not go into the second mine, or that there would not be invested money in mines or in anything else in a Territory that would pay dividends?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, but the Senator's examples are hardly fair. What people want to do is to be able to locally control the laws affecting their investments. Every one knows—and I think the Senator will bear me out—that Idaho, for instance, would not have been developed if she had not been a State.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him again?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course I can not bear the Senator out. Oklohoma and Indian Territory prove the reverse. But conceding that we know a method, conceding that this Territory was already a State, conceding both of these things, how long, as a practical irrigator, does the Senator say it would take to establish this irrigation down there?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, the work would go on rapidly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Could it be done in five years?

Mr. BURTON. Something would be done each year.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Could it be done in ten years?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, sir. For instance, the development of Pecos Valley has been within the last five or ten years, and that has required, for instance, the building of 300 miles of railway on the part of the Rock Island road, and there are other surveys going on now through that Territory, based very largely upon the belief that the Territory is going to speedily become a State.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator can give us information upon this subject. Does the Senator mean to have us understand that the Rock Island Railroad, which runs through the Territory and joins the Southern Pacific at El Paso, ran through there on account of any irrigation development—that that was the purpose of the building of that road?

Mr. BURTON. I do not think the road would have been built at all but for the marvelous development of the Pecos Valley.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I do not mean——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That road does not go through the irrigated district.

Mr. BURTON. Of course it does not go through the Pecos Valley, but it goes through a territory that may be developed similar to that; and right before the eyes of those capitalists was the marvelous development that could be made by the proper expenditure of capital and the encouragement of immigration, as shown by the development in the Pecos Valley.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And the Senator states, as a man familiar with the building of that railroad down there, that the reason why that line was connected with the trunk line, thus cutting off a great section of country, was because they thought it could be irrigated in the future.

Mr. BURTON. Yes, sir; exactly——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That that was the reason.

Mr. BURTON. One of the strongest reasons why the railroads are seeking New Mexico is the belief that it is going to be made a State. Everybody thought it was going to be a State without opposition, since both political parties had resolved that it should be.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There is one railroad which undoubtedly was projected with the view that New Mexico was going to be a State.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; and not only one, but more than one.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I know of one.

Mr. BURTON. I was talking to some capitalists in St. Louis on my way here this time, and they are to be there this summer with a view of building a line. They expected it would become a State, and naturally, of course, capital wants to go into a State rather than a Territory.

Now excuse me. I beg pardon of the Senator from New Hampshire for precipitating this debate along these lines. I feel that I am to blame for it, but I did not think it would go so far. Hereafter the honorable chairman of the committee and I can perhap settle some of these questions on the outside.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Just one word. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will excuse me for a minute.

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Because I do not want the Senator from Kansas to give the Senate the impression that I made a statement to this body that the rain belt traveled backward and forward and up and down, or anything of that kind. No, certainly not; and I do not think the Senator will find in the RECORD that I made any such statement. Rain belts are pretty thoroughly established; but of course I could not, as a reader of scientific literature on the subject of precipitation, agree with the Senator that rainfall is the same the world over. I do not think it is true.

Furthermore, I was struck by the beautiful simile of the Senator, that the rain is the parent of the tree and not the tree the parent of the rain. Well, that may be. I think if that is true, however, that the rain is also the parent of the potato and of corn and of alfalfa and other things, and therefore where there is not any rain there are not apt to be very many of rain's nutritious children. Those are the things upon which human beings live, and that is the situation which exists in these Territories. Therefore the Senator has by his apt and poetical illustration put in those few words the whole argument.

Now, about the cutting down of trees affecting rain, the Senator says it does not, but I think I can show him one fact in connection with the destruction or growth of forests which does affect rainfall. For example, here is a vast tract of country on which there is a forest. That forest is cut down, as has occurred on so many mountains and even in so many districts where there are no mountains. As the Senator says, that forest acts as a reservoir, it holds the waters, holds them gradually, the ground is soaked, and also the atmosphere is full of moisture, and therefore there is the formation of local showers. That is a thing, certainly, which is familiar to the Senator.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Indiana some time will want to retract those words, because he is mistaken. Hence, I suggest that perhaps we had better adjourn that part of the discussion. It does not affect it so as to create precipitation. It does not come up high enough to do that. For instance, we passed a bill to purchase a large amount of land on the apex of the slopes of the Appalachian range, with which the Senator is familiar, because I inherited it from him. However, it was not because it would increase or decrease the rainfall, but the roots of the trees, and the rain falling upon the leaves and breaking, so as to go down——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let it soak in.

Mr. BURTON. It causes the water to be conserved, but it does not increase it. If you measure the rainfall in the Appalachian range it will be found that the condition is just as it has been at Fort Leavenworth, Fort Riley, also at Fort Lyon, at Santa Fe, and at other points for a great many years, and in the valley of Mexico. The same ditches now in the valley of Mexico were there when Cortez took the country. Three hundred and fifty years before the time of Christ the biggest reservoir to impound waters that ever had been built was destroyed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So it is not a recent discovery?

Mr. BURTON. Not at all.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I thought the Senator said it was.

Mr. BURTON. It is only of recent application in this country. You see we have so much land here. However, I will desist.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course, I do not want to make any misstatement about the question of the effect of the cutting down of trees on rainfall. But I have more than my recollection of the books on this subject. There was on the subcommittee on this trip a Senator exceedingly familiar with this whole subject. I remember his very entertaining and informing conversations. It was the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEITFELD] and he described with great force the effect, even in open places, of the building of reservoirs and basins; how long it took for the water to soak in and make the ground hard, so that it would hold the water; how long it took to fill the atmosphere around full of moisture, so that it would not be all absorbed, and then how the effect from that gradually came to be local rains. I do not think I am entirely without information upon this subject. But the Senator from Kansas may be right. I have no doubt that the Senator has studied the question more carefully than I, and of course I thank the Senator for all his information.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, I desire to add something more as a contribution from the Governor of New Mexico, in his report to the Secretary of the Interior, upon the question which has just now been interesting the Senate. From the last report I quote a further statement:

> But altitude increases aridity by decreasing atmospheric pressure, and thus accelerating evaporation. The elevation of New Mexico averaging about 1 mile above sea level, and reaching in the higher valleys to nearly 2 miles, it can be seen at once that water here most readily gives off its vapor. Especially is this true when taken in connection with the dry condition of the air and the almost ceaseless movements of the winds. The moisture that falls is immediately taken up into the air again. A snow of 2 or 3 inches in depth will pass away in a few hours, leaving the ground dry, having apparently returned into the air instead of melting.
> A refeshing shower in a day or two will have disappeared leaving no mud behind. This is why any kind of a cloud is rare, and a day during some part of which the sun does not shine is almost unknown. Then, too, it must be remembered that the general slope of the country is on an average of about 10 feet to a mile, causing water, even in the streams (unless impounded), to run quickly away. For these reasons the humidity of the air in New Mexico averages about 36 per cent, while in New England it is 73 per cent; Florida, 75 per cent: San Francisco, 76 per cent, and the Gulf States, 79 per cent. (Pp. 3, 4.)

It is an undisputed fact that the rainfall in this Territory is not sufficient, except to a very limited extent in the mountain regions, for any kind of farming, and that the agricultural interests are wholly dependent, except in those regions, upon some system of irrigation.

Witness after witness came before the committee and testified to the same fact, both in connection with New Mexico and Arizona, that practically the agricultural interests of both were dependent upon irrigation.

In remote periods canals and ditches were dug and used to distribute water over these arid lands. Evidence of this, as I have before stated, has been discovered in recent attempts at irrigation.

The Indians and Mexicans in later times, in a small and primitive way, have watered their lands when near some river, and the enterprise and ingenuity of Americans has, in recent years, been directed to the construction and operation of the best irrigation works, but the result has not always been encouraging and there seems to be a practical limit beyond which this work can not be carried.

Much depends upon the location and elevation of land and the economy with which a system may be established. Canals can not be successfully used for very long distances from the source of supply. The territory to be covered must necessarily be limited, and in fact to-day, with all the expenditure that has been made, the number of acres under cultivation in the Territory is only 303,438 out of a total of more than 78,000,000.

In this connection I wish to cite, as corroborating the statement made by me a few moments ago, the testimony given before the committee by Mr. C. M. Foraker, to whom I have before referred, that except in the river bottoms there is nothing but grazing land, and that nothing can be raised away from the water.

A serious question is already attracting attention, and that is as to the supply of water from any source.

The Rio Grande is dry for several months in the year from Albuquerque down to El Paso, in Texas. The Delegate from New Mexico stated at a hearing in Albuquerque in November last that for months in every year the Rio Grande opposite that place was entirely dry.

When passing over a long bridge from El Paso to the city of Juarez in Mexico, on our recent visit, I was looking with eager expectation to see the waters of a mighty river, "the Rio Grande," but I looked in vain. The river bed was as dry as the streets of El Paso, and in fact no trace of water was visible. It was used by pedestrians, old and young, instead of the bridge. It has been said that somewhere below the pathway of these travelers the river may be flowing, but if so it has given no sign for many hundred miles and no evidence of that claim was presented to the committee. It is more probable that systems of irrigation in Colorado have taken the water supply of this river and caused its bed during several months of the year, from above Albuquerque to the southern boundary of the Territory, to be as dry as its desert banks.

The Governor of the Territory, in his last report, says:

> This stream—
> The Rio Grande—
> is the only available source of supply for irrigation water throughout the greater part of the district named, and since that part of the year during which the river is dry is the time when more water is needed for irrigation than at any other season or all other seasons, the disappearing of the stream at that time is peculiarly unfortunate for all the people living in the district named, which is the most thickly settled portion of the Territory. This "summer dry spell," which is now a regular occurrence, is the result of conditions that have grown up during the last twenty-five years, chief among which may be mentioned the denudation of the timber lands of the Colorado mountains, among which the river takes its rise, and the construction of great irrigation canals in the State of Colorado, taking their waters from the stream before it enters this Territory.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the last statement read by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BURTON. What is it?

Mr. BURNHAM. The Governor said:

> This "summer dry spell," which is now a regular occurrence, is the result of conditions that have grown up during the last twenty-five years, chief among which may be mentioned the denudation of the timber lands of the Colorado Mountains, among which the river takes its rise, and the construction of great irrigation canals in the State of Colorado, taking their waters from the stream before it enters this Territory.

He continues:

> Each of these two principal causes, it will readily be seen, exercises a very powerful influence to the end of diminishing the regular summer flow of the stream, and since both occur within the limits of a neighboring State, it is beyond the power of the people of New Mexico to prevent or modify them. (P. 214.)

The Rio Grande and the Pecos are the principal sources of water supply for irrigation. The water of the Pecos is nearly all utilized in the canals between Roswell and Carlsbad. According to the testimony of Mr. Newell, its waters can not be profitably used for a considerable distance as it goes toward the Texas line, on account of the large amount of gypsum which it carries in solution. While used in small quantities gypsum is a fertilizer and helpful to agriculture, but when left upon land to such an amount as is carried by these waters it is highly injurious and destructive to crops. (P. 175.)

Mr. Newell states that he has seen a great many acres of orchard land and hundreds of acres of alfalfa land that had been destroyed by what is locally called the "gyp" deposit. (P. 175.)

The only solution of the question of irrigation must be found in the storage of flood waters or in the digging of wells which reach the underflow wherever it exists.

Reservoirs, it is said, may be constructed in different parts of the Territory, but no system has yet been determined upon as feasible. The prediction is made that they may be built within the next generation or century. Experiments have been made to secure a supply of water from the underflow by wells and the use of pumps, but these have not always been successful. A plant was installed about 7 miles south of Albuquerque last winter as an advertisement for a company interested in such work, but the Governor of the Territory, in the report referred to, makes this statement:

> It throws a fine stream of water, ample to fully demonstrate the abundance of the supply, and sufficient to irrigate 2 or 3 acres by direct application, but to be of any practical value this water would have to be stored in a reservoir from which it could be led on to the land in a much larger volume than could be discharged from any pump that could be put up at a cost within the reach of men of moderate means. The plant here referred to, with its pump, pipes, steam engine, and air compressor, cost, according the figures of the proprietor, $5,000, a sum which takes it entirely out of the list of feasible appliances for solving the irrigation problem.
> The valley lands of this Territory are so porous that a stream of water such as can be thrown by any pump of moderate dimensions is absorbed within the space of a few square rods, and, instead of spreading itself over the field, continues to go downward till it meets the permanent water, which is only a few feet below the surface; and, in order to irrigate a tract as large as an ordinary field, it is necessary to turn on the water in such a large volume that it will force its way over the ground before the earth has time to absorb much of it, or otherwise a small part of the area to be irrigated will get too much water and the remainder little or none.
> Such a pumping plant as the one here referred to, if kept running constantly during the fall, winter, and early spring, and discharging into a reservoir, would be able to store up a supply sufficient to enable it to irrigate 500 to 1,000 acres or more during the summer; but the construction of such a reservoir would cost a sum of money that would put it entirely beyond the reach of any community of home builders on the public domain. (P. 216.)

The great difficulties in the way of the successful pursuit of agriculture have not as yet been overcome. The result is problematic. The growth of New Mexico, depending largely upon that industry, can not be assured until future experiments have demonstrated with certainty the practical use of extensive systems of irrigation.

Great attention has been given to this subject for many years, but the results can not be entirely satisfactory to those who are especially interested in the future progress and development of this Territory.

Stock raising, which has been and is an important industry, depends upon a supply of water. While passing through the country in November last the committee found what appeared to be the beds of rivers and streams entirely dry. In some places, as at Las Cruces, the canals and ditches carried no water, but were as dry as the surrounding country.

The evidence before the committee has been conclusive in establishing the fact that cattle must be kept within 5 miles of some source of water supply. The area for grazing must for this reason be greatly limited. Surely the Rio Grande, the largest river in New Mexico, during the summer months, from above Albuquerque south to the boundary line, could furnish no water for grazing purposes, and this must be true in a large measure of other streams and rivers.

I desire to call attention now to the testimony of Mr. Newell before the committee and to read a part of his statement in order that the views of a scientist who has been intimately acquainted with this Territory since 1888 and has given great attention to this subject may be accurately presented (P. 173 et seq.):

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state to the committee, in your own way, the situation in the Territory of New Mexico with reference to the question of aridity?

Mr. NEWELL. The Territory is well within the arid region, and agriculture there is dependent almost entirely upon the artificial application of water.

The CHAIRMAN. By the artificial application of water you mean irrigation?

Mr. NEWELL. Yes, sir; irrigation. The principal source of supply is the Rio Grande and its largest tributary, the Pecos River. The United States Geological Survey has been measuring the flow of the Rio Grande where it enters New Mexico, and at various points along its course. We have also measured some of its tributaries, and have measured where it leaves the Territory to form the boundary line between Texas and the Republic of Mexico. We have been making studies of the extent to which that water can be used for irrigation purposes in the future.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state to the committee the extent to which that water is used at present?

Mr. NEWELL. The usual summer supply is entirely employed, and there is now a considerable acreage under cultivation for which there is not a sufficient supply of water in all seasons. The spring flow—the floods—in large part go to waste, and water storage is absolutely essential to the future development of the Territory.

LITTLE OR NO WATER STORAGE.

The CHAIRMAN. Does water storage at present exist there?

Mr. NEWELL. There is very little, if any, water storage. There is some on a few of the tributaries of the Rio Grande.

The CHAIRMAN. What would you say about the sufficiency or insufficiency of the water in the Rio Grande for irrigation purposes by means of canals? I will state that the committee, on its recent trip, went along for a considerable distance and observed an absence of water there. That is the reason I ask the question.

Mr. NEWELL. There are very few canals of any considerable size on the Rio Grande. Most of them are small ditches built by the Indians or Mexicans, and the supply is not sufficient for all the irrigated lands in the latter part of the crop season. The river is frequently dry from the international boundary north. That is the normal condition of the Territory. The future development of the region rests upon the feasibility of constructing reservoirs along the Rio Grande, and especially in the northern part of the Territory. There are also several projects for water storage in the southern portions of the Territory, and their feasibility will be determined by the regularity of the spring floods.

In this connection I desire to call attention to certain affidavits that have been filed, presented here and read, in which statements are made that the Rio Grande opposite Albuquerque has never been dry except in two or three instances, and that above that point there is water. This is a manifest attempt to discredit the statement of Mr. Newell. For the purpose of corroborating his testimony—although it needs no support, the character of the man being sufficient to give credit to his testimony anywhere—I desire to read certain statements. One of them was made before the committee at Albuquerque by the Delegate from the Territory, in these words:

Colorado has taken so much of the water north of us that the river is dry many months of the year right opposite the room in which you sit. The irrigation bill is the greatest law that was ever passed for the West since the homestead law was passed. (P. 89.)

At another time the same Delegate, now representing the Territory, in making a statement before the committee prior to its visit to the Territory, said:

Time went on. After a while Colorado began to use a great deal of water, and it began to grow less. Timber was taken off in Colorado and northern New Mexico, and the water flowed away so rapidly that clear from central New Mexico to the mouth of the Concho, where it comes in from old Mexico, for many months of the year there is not a drop of water on the surface of the Rio Grande as you see it on the maps. (P. 376.)

Again I want to read from the last report of the Governor of New Mexico:

From the southern boundary of New Mexico up to a point about 30 miles north of Albuquerque the water of the Rio Grande now regularly disappears every summer, and for at least two months the bed of the stream is absolutely dry except in years of unusual rainfall. This stream is the only available source of supply for irrigation water throughout the greater part of the district named. (P. 214.)

The Chairman put this question to Mr. Newell:

Is that a matter of certainty, or is it problematical and experimental?

Mr. NEWELL. That is a matter which we are to determine by the surveys now in progress. We believe it possible to construct reservoirs at different parts of the Territory and think they will be built within the next century or generation. But no one system has yet been determined upon as feasible.

The CHAIRMAN. That is as far as you have gotten?

Mr. NEWELL. Yes, sir.

I desire to call attention to this fact stated by a scientist, by one who certainly—from his experience, beginning back in 1888—must be acquainted with the Territory and whose special business and object it has been to determine the conditions of the Territory in this particular matter. When he says this and can give no further encouragement it seems to me to be an important consideration:

We believe it possible to construct reservoirs at different parts of the Territory, and think they will be built within the next century or generation. But no one system has yet been determined upon as feasible.

It is true, as I infer somewhat from the discussion of a few moments ago, that we, so far as this country is concerned, are only beginning to work out the problems of irrigation and the storage of waters, and it will take time, long experience, and a vast expenditure of money before any system will be developed that will prove feasible.

The Chairman further questioned Mr. Newell:

The CHAIRMAN. You speak about the river being dry. The committee observed at El Paso, Tex., that the river was entirely dry and dusty, and people were walking across its bed instead of across the bridge.

Mr. NEWELL. That is the normal condition during the summer season.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe you said the other portion of the Territory where there was water was the Pecos, did you not?

Mr. NEWELL. The Pecos is the principal stream of eastern New Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state the supply of that stream, and the availability of its water for irrigation, the character of the water, and other scientific facts which will enlighten the committee?

Mr. NEWELL. The Pecos drains an area of what is generally known as red beds, in which there is a good deal of gypsum, which is easily soluble in river water. The river itself is controlled by storage reservoirs. There is one at Lake McMillan, about 12 miles above Roswell, and a secondary one at Lake Avalon, nearer Roswell. Below that it receives water from springs, from the Hondo and a number of other rivers, and the flow is increased. It is nearly all utilized in the canals between Roswell and Carlsbad. Below Carlsbad little water is taken from the river usually, the portion utilized being that taken out by the canals at Pecos City, south of the Territorial line in Texas. The water, as it goes toward the Texas line, is heavily charged with gypsum, which is taken in solution from the soil through which the water flows. The storage capacity on Pecos River and the tributaries can doubtless be increased somewhat, but as to how much it can be increased no one knows at present.

GYPSUM IN THE PECOS.

The CHAIRMAN. You speak of gypsum. Please state to the committee what its effect is—whether it is a fertilizer or the reverse. What effect does gypsum have upon the soil over which it is distributed by the flow of the Pecos River?

Mr. NEWELL. Gypsum is frequently known as a land plaster and is used in the East as a fertilizer. It is beneficial up to a certain point, but above that point it becomes destructive to crops. The soils of Pecos Valley contain the gypsum in small quantities. As it increases in percentage it becomes concentrated and injurious. I have seen in the past month a great many acres of orchard land and hundreds of acres of alfalfa land that had been destroyed by what is locally called the "gyp" deposit.

The CHAIRMAN. You have entered generally into the two tracts where there is a possibility of irrigation from streams. I will ask you to state to the committee whether there is any possibility of agriculture in any other portion of the Territory on account of the lack of water.

MORE AGRICULTURE POSSIBLE.

Mr. NEWELL. The extreme northwestern portion along the San Juan River has a fairly good water supply, and there they raise, near Farmington, very valuable fruits; but the area of agricultural land is restricted. Outside of that area and a few other localities where springs and streams exist agriculture is impossible.

The CHAIRMAN. Here is a map of New Mexico [indicating] which has upon it black areas, dotted areas, and white areas. Is that map prepared by your department?

That is a map which has been before the committee and has been before Senators, and I think all are familiar with it.

Mr. NEWELL. This map is one of a series prepared in the office of the United States Geological Survey from the records of the Land Office. It shows in black the lands which have passed out of the ownership of the Government into the ownership of corporations or individuals.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS.

The CHAIRMAN. What was done under the Mexican land grants?

Mr. NEWELL. Most of the large, black, patches on the New Mexico map indicate the area and location of the Mexican land grants, confirmed by treaty with Mexico. The smaller dots on the map represent homestead and other entries made under the existing land laws. The checkerboard pattern in the central part of the Territory represents the alternate sections of land donated to the railroads. The white is the land still in the ownership of the National Government and subject to disposal under existing laws.

The CHAIRMAN. First, taking the black areas, I will ask you whether or not those black areas include all irrigable land, or all land which will support either human or animal life?

Mr. NEWELL. They include practically all of the agricultural land to which water can readily be brought. There is in New Mexico probably no area in the ownership of the United States on which a man can now make a living, except by cattle raising.

I desire to call attention at this moment to what may not have been observed, perhaps, by some Senators. The Chairman made another inquiry, which I will read:

The CHAIRMAN. The black areas include all such lands, but are the entire portions of the black areas such lands as you have described, or is there a portion of them that is of value?

Mr. NEWELL. Considerable portions of the black—areas, that is, the land grants—are nonirrigable and perfectly arid. The lands are valuable mainly for timber and grazing, but not for agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the fact about the white areas—shown on the map—which are subject now to further entry and occupation, as to whether they are capable of supporting any industry or any population?

PORTIONS CAN NOT BE FURTHER DEVELOPED.

Mr. NEWELL. The vacant public lands, shown in white, can not support any industry beyond grazing, excepting in the timbered portions. Some timber lands belong to the Government still, but the remaining area is composed of grazing lands and is not capable of further development.

The CHAIRMAN. With reference to grazing lands. A great deal of testimony was given before the committee to the effect that grazing was possible for cattle up to a limit of 5 miles on either side of a water course or water hole. In this white area on this map it does not appear that there are any streams or water courses. Is that the case?

Mr. NEWELL. The grazing there will support a cow to 10, 20, or 30 acres, provided water can be had within a radius of about 5 miles. That is a fair journey for a cow.

The CHAIRMAN. You have already described the available water sources of the Territory in answer to former questions?

Mr. NEWELL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You spoke about the timber tracts. What is the fact about the timber tracts having been largely, or somewhat, at least, taken up by grants to institutions or otherwise?

Mr. NEWELL. The timber areas are rapidly being entered upon under the existing laws, and particularly through the laws granting lands to the Territory for certain institutions, and for the improvement of the Rio Grande.

PROPORTION OF IRRIGATED AREA.

The CHAIRMAN. A question is suggested to me, which seems to be very pertinent. You have described the limit of the irrigation area. Could you roughly state the proportion that that irrigation area bears to the whole area of the Territory?

Mr. NEWELL. I do not recall the exact figures. They are published in a report prepared for the Twelfth Census. It is my impression that about one-fourth of 1 per cent of the area of the Territory is irrigated.

The total area of this Territory is 78,374,400 acres. If I read the census of 1900 aright, the total improved acreage after centuries of occupation is only 303,438; and the total that is irrigated to-day, after all the efforts of our active, enterprising Americans and those who preceded them, is only 203,893, out of a total of more than 78,000,000 acres. And when we come to reckon the per cent we find that it is only .26 of 1 per cent of the total area that is now irrigated.

Another Senator inquired:

That is the percentage that is irrigated?

Mr. NEWELL. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Let me ask this: They have practically irrigated all that it is possible to irrigate under present conditions?

The answer from Mr. Newell, an unprejudiced witness, intelligent, as everyone knows, was:

Yes, sir; without water storage.

Senator NELSON. Without storage?

Mr. NEWELL. Yes.

By Mr. Newell's testimony we are strongly impressed with the fact that there is some doubt as to any considerable progress hereafter in New Mexico along agricultural lines. Water must be found that does not now appear in the beds of streams or rivers, or by the outlay of large amounts reservoirs must be built to hold the water that comes from the uncertain quantity of melted snow in the mountains and from the exceedingly variable rainfall. The tendency, from causes already stated, is toward a lessening supply of water. Droughts have been more severe than ever before during the past few years.

In her present condition New Mexico is not prepared for statehood. Let her future progress be established by something more than an unreliable prediction before this privilege is granted her!

ARGUMENTS OF THE FRIENDS OF STATEHOOD.

But her advocates say that a Territorial condition is no longer endurable, that she is suffering from the denial of her statehood claim, and that if she could only become a State her progress and prosperity would be assured.

Does the fact of her being a Territory materially affect the growth of her population?

Oklahoma, not yet a State and only since May 2, 1890, possessed of a Territorial government, had, by the census of 1900, 398,245 inhabitants. What brought within her borders this marvelous number of people? Her growth between the census of 1890 and 1900 was 336,411.

The comparative increase in population of other Territories ten years before and ten years after they became States, although not exactly ascertained from the census, does not indicate that a Territorial government is a bar to such increase.

I call attention to the growth in population of the seven States last admitted into the Union.

South Dakota, admitted November 2, 1889, a few months before the census of 1890, had in 1880 a population of 98,268; in 1890, 328,808, a gain of 230,540; in 1900, 401,570, a gain of 72,762—a much larger gain during the ten years before her admission than during the ten years after, taking into account, as we should, the six months that intervened between the date of admission and taking of the census.

North Dakota, admitted on the same day, had in 1880 a population of 36,909; in 1890, 182,719, a gain of 145,810; in 1900, 319,146, a gain of 136,427.

Montana, admitted November 8, 1889, had in 1880 a population of 39,159; in 1890, 132,159, a gain of 93,000; in 1900, 243,329, a gain of 111,170.

Washington, admitted November 11, 1889, had in 1880 a population of 75,116; in 1890, 349,390, a gain of 274,274; in 1900, 518,103, a gain of 168,713.

Idaho, admittted July 3, 1890, had in 1880 a population of 32,610; in 1890, 84,385, a gain of 51,775; in 1900, 161,772, a gain of 77,387.

Wyoming, admitted July 10, 1890, had in 1880 a population of 20,789; in 1890, 60,705, a gain of 39,916; in 1900, 92,531, a gain of 31,826.

Utah, admitted January 4, 1896, had in 1880 a population of 143,963; in 1890, 207,905, a gain of 63,942; in 1900, 276,749, a gain of 68,844.

The Indian Territory, with not even a Territorial form of government, had by the last census a population of 392,060.

It certainly can not be true that the fact of its being a Territory barred out population. If the figures which have been given out by enthusiastic friends of statehood are correct, then assuredly, although she is a Territory, people from other States have been pouring in there in vast numbers.

It seems more reasonable to believe that men and women who seek to change their homes and to better their condition by engaging in agricultural pursuits in a new country would find a stronger inducement and a greater attraction in a land where the soil is fertile, where the rain falls in abundance, where the crops are assured, and the climate desirable than they would in the fact that the government is State rather than Territorial.

The positive evidence of that fact is found in the development of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory and in the comparative statement which has just been given.

Another complaint is that capital can not be induced to enter the Territory at a low rate of interest because of its form of government.

But it seems that when new bonds have been issued there, it has been possible to secure money at 4 per cent, while in Oklahoma it is said that only low rates of interest are paid, and that investment companies regard her bonds and other securities as among the most desirable in the whole country.

It is not probable that investors would refuse to transact business and make their loans from the single fact that the borrowers and the property are within the borders of a Territory.

Capital, as has been often said, is invested not because of sentiment, but on account of good security, and whenever the cities, districts, or citizens of New Mexico shall furnish the necessary and required security, I can not believe there will be wanting those who will gladly invest, at a reasonable interest and without inquiry as to her being a Territory or a State.

Another complaint has been alleged, relating to the matter of taxation. This is not well founded. From the date of the first session of her legislative assembly, which was convened at Santa Fe, June 2, 1851, all her laws, under which taxes have been levied, have been enacted by her own representatives in the Territorial council and house.

If these laws have not been satisfactory, or have failed because unjust, or for want of enforcement, or if assessments and collection have not been properly made, the fault is with her own people, and the remedy is not through statehood.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The query occurs to my mind at this point. How would the defect of nonassessment, or low assessment, and imperfect taxation, all of which is now the condition under Territorial government itself, be remedied by statehood. It would still be a subject for their legislature exactly as it is now?

Mr. BURNHAM. That question is a reasonable one. It certainly can not be that statehood, as I suggested, offers the slightest remedy, whatever may be said in regard to taxation.

Not a law has been set aside by Congress that any citizen to-day, so far as we have ascertained, would ask to have retained on their statute books. It is true that all Territories, including their cities, towns, and districts, have been required to keep their indebtedness within the limit prescribed by the Harrison Act, but that is universally conceded to have been a wise and salutary measure.

The privilege of statehood could give this Territory no greater control over the means and methods of taxation than it has to-day.

One objection to the present status is that the judges in the Territory are not elected by the people.

In some States judges are appointed by the Governor, and their term of office continues for life, until they are removed for cause, or until an age limit terminates their tenure. Federal judges are, as everyone knows, appointed by the President.

An elective judiciary is subject to all the changes of party politics and is sometimes dependent upon the powerful influence of capital or the favor of large associations. The integrity of courts ought never to be open to suspicion and distrust, and the system of appointment of Territorial judges by the President removes the office from local influences and has in it much that is commendable.

At all events, no sufficient ground for complaint has ever been found. Their judges are appointed, as a rule, only from among their own people and for a term of four years. They are and have been men of incorruptible integrity, of distinguished ability, and worthy of their high office. Would an elective judiciary have given better courts or a more satisfactory administration of justice? If not, then surely there is no ground for complaint.

It is true that the Territorial Governors are not elected by the people, but receive their appointment from the President. In former times, when these men were selected from outside the Territories, there was just cause for complaint, but in later years, with hardly an exception, some one of their own citizens has held this high office.

We met these Governors, and our belief is that no convention could have nominated and no party elected more intelligent, more capable, or more honorable men than those whom the President has named.

The General Government has not been unfair or ungenerous to this people. New Mexico's claims to statehood have not been granted, it is true, but her own Governor in his last report stated that "prior to the advent of the railroads and the introduction and maintenance of the public school system it is an admitted fact that New Mexico was not prepared for statehood." (P. 21.)

Railroads were not extensively built in the Territory until after 1880, and no thoroughly complete and satisfactory school system was established until 1891. Not yet have the results of that school system brought her people up to that standard of education reasonably required for statehood.

It is a fact of universal knowledge that the Southwest is a land of sunshine. Perhaps nowhere else can be seen so many cloudless days. Here many who have suffered from wasting diseases have found health and strength, with happiness and a new lease of life.

But, unfortunately, clouds are needed and rain must fall if the land is to respond in the most generous and beneficial way to the labors of the husbandman.

This is an imperial domain. It is an empire in itself. Its long distances surprise the traveler, and its mountain scenery, so grand and impressive, excites in the visitor a feeling of wonder and admiration.

But area, unnumbered acres, and the grandest mountains do not constitute a State or give the certain promise of a successful people; nor does the sunshine, although it makes every day throughout the year bright and beautiful, lay the foundations upon which can rest the structure of a new and prosperous State.

[At this point Mr. BURNHAM yielded the floor for the day.]

Thursday, January 22, 1903.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, I desire now to proceed with what I have to say in regard to the admission of New Mexico. While people of Spanish-Mexican descent would have the power numerically to control the new State if New Mexico were now admitted, they might not exercise that power; but the question is whether it is wise or desirable at this time to entrust the sustaining and upbuilding of a State to the people of a Territory that may be under the domination of an alien race.

Mr. Thomas Hughes, a gentleman of exceptional attainments and ability, who has been in the Territory since 1881, the publisher of a leading newspaper, and thoroughly familiar with the conditions and the people of New Mexico, in the course of his advocacy of statehood before the committee said, speaking of the Mexicans:

> They are a quiet, peaceable people. You must remember that up to 1865 the peons of this Territory, which was possibly two-thirds of the population, were practically slaves.

I call attention to this because it is the statement of a man who has lived there many years and is thorougly familiar with the Territory, certainly unprejudiced in making such a statement. He says that no longer ago than 1865 two-thirds of the population of this Territory were peons and were practically slaves. Continuing, he stated:

> Lincoln's emancipation proclamation emancipated them. We have two or three hundred of them here working in the railroad shops. They are faithful workers. Forty or fifty of them are working in the woolen mills. They are not energetic. They do not care about getting rich, like Americans. They are perfectly willing to let things go easy. They never suggest anything in the legislative assembly. They are perfectly willing to let anything go through. If you get a bill through and the next session you want to amend it they say nothing, but go ahead and vote for the amendment. (P. 64.)

While these men might be very convenient to politicians under some circumstances, yet certainly, if they were under bad leadership, it would be most unfortunate for that Territory and unfortunate for the State if it became such.

So, then, it is indeed of consequence to consider the statement of this man, who says that there are members of the legislature of that race who are apparently indifferent to legislative matters. They go into the legislature and they vote apparently as someone directs.

Right here I recall a statement which was published, but for the truth of which I can not vouch. It was to the effect that in one of their legislative assemblies an American preceding a Mexican was voting viva voce for a certain candidate. Not caring to express himself by vote for this man or that man, he said, "I vote for Mr. Blank," whereupon the Mexican legislator, wishing to vote for the American's candidate, said, "I vote for Mr. Blank."

Further along in his testimony Mr. Hughes said:

> I can carry this county on any proposition by 3,600 majority.

This is in Bernalillo County, where the Mexicans hold the balance of power.

The singular statement is made by this intelligent man and great newspaper publisher that on any proposition, it mattered not what it might be, whether reasonable or unreasonable, patriotic or unpatriotic, he could carry that county by 3,600 majority.

This is the class of people constituting to-day a majority in the Territory upon which Congress is asked to confer the privilege and honor of American statehood.

It has been said that we have by immigration each year a very large number of foreigners. They come from southern Italy, they come from Austria, and they come from other parts of Europe, and it has been said that they are undesirable as additions to this great country, that they are illiterates, and possibly some of them criminals; and it was further said by an advocate of statehood that this great country absorbs them all and suffers no harm from this addition. But we understand that this large number is scattered over the land; although it is larger, perhaps, in the Atlantic States and in our great cities. Whatever may be the number of those who come to us from abroad, they are scattered, but here in this Territory is a compact alien race with but little knowledge of our Government, our laws, or our institutions.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. QUARLES. I notice in the testimony taken by your committee the testimony of a Mexican who spoke about a custom which obtained in New Mexico, which is quite similar to the statement just made by the Senator from New Hampshire. He spoke of the Mexican population in the case of a popular election following an emblem, being utterly unable to understand the ticket. I did not know but the Senator, being a member of the committee which visited that country, could inform the Senate a little more particularly as to what is the meaning of that expression. It was new to me. Perhaps the Senator can furnish us that information.

Mr. BURNHAM. I am very glad of the interruption and the suggestion. The testimony was that of the witness, Martinez Amador, who has been named before in this discussion. He said that Mexicans there, even when using a Spanish ballot, would vote this way or that on account of some emblem, some distinctive mark, upon the ballot; in other words, looking at the ballot, though they could not read a word upon it, they could see some sort of a picture, some sort of a sign; and by that sign they cast their vote.

Mr. President, if I understood the testimony of the witness correctly, that is not an uncommon instance, but it very often occurs among the people whom he describes as so unfortunately ignorant.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, in connection with what the Senator from New Hampshire has stated in respect to the methods which prevail in regard to elections in New Mexico, I have in my possession here a letter, which, I think, is quite interesting, and, if the Senator will allow me, I shall ask that it be read at the desk. It is only a page and a half of typewriting.

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It refers also to Martinez Amador, who, I think, is the star witness for those who are opposing statehood.

Mr. BURNHAM. I shall be very glad to hear from the witness—the more the better.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the letter referred to by the Senator from North Dakota will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

> OFFICE OF RIO GRANDE REPUBLICAN,
> ALLEN J. PAPEN, EDITOR AND PUBLISHER,
> Las Cruces, N. Mex., December 25, 1902.
> HON. BERNARD S. RODEY, Washington, D. C.
> DEAR FRIEND: I have received a copy of the new statehood bill, No. 36. I have read over the testimony of those who testified before the committee when they were here and find that one Martin Amador (they have it Martinez Amador in the report) voluntarily appeared and presented a rather vicious indictment against our native people.

Now, Martin Amador is one of our old cranks here to whom no one pays any attention. I have heard him called the "Las Cruces anarchist" and also "the town fool."

Between twenty and thirty years ago he was a freighter from here to northern New Mexico, Colorado, and Kansas, and while in that business accumulated quite a little property here, and of late years he lived from the income of his little ranches and a small livery business. He does not keep up his property, and is always opposed to any improvements in the town. He is against railroads, incorporation of towns, or anything that might raise his taxes a little. He was even opposed to the building or irrigation enterprises, his excuse being that in a few years corporations would own all the land. Not long ago, in giving his reasons for being opposed to statehood, he said: "I am against statehood, because if we get statehood our taxes will be 7 per cent. I know, because when I freighted to Colorado and Kansas taxes in those States were 7 per cent." I see the report says he voluntarily appeared. After the committee had gone he told Martin Lohman that he had been summoned before them, having received a letter from them six days before they came. He explained that they had secured his name from the Post-Office Department, he being also a mail carrier. That same evening, in a saloon, he told Isidoro Armijo, probate clerk, that he had given statehood hell; that he did not care if he was the only man here against statehood; he would do all he could to defeat it.

Now that his evidence is here in black and white, he denies that he ever made such statements. In speaking about it to me he said: "If they say that I said that most of the Mexicans were ignorant, that they voted by the emblem, and that they did not understand what statehood meant, they reported me wrong. I said some of them were that way, but not many."

The native people are all up in arms against him and threaten to hold indignation meetings.

Now, Amador's statement reminds me of some things I saw at the polls on our last election day. I was standing near the polls watching some of the workers work for their ticket. I saw one hand a native from the country a ticket that was pasted over, telling him that was a Democratic ticket. The native took it, looked at it, and said, "It has the rooster at the head, but that is about all," and turning to several near him, continued, "Look here; see how they are fixing tickets."

I do not know whether others tried to vote the same ticket, but I do know that none of them were voted. I saw another who had a crowd around him, each side wanting him to vote for their men. He took one of each of the tickets in the field, walked to the polls, and voted one of them. No one knew how he voted, but I am sure he knew how he voted. I also saw Martin Amador vote that afternoon. He came to the polls, walked up to Surveyor-General Llewellyn, handed him a citizens' ticket, and asked him to fix it for him. Llewellyn put on pasters as directed, folded it, and handed it to Amador. Amador walked to the polls with the folded ticket in his hand. Morgan Llewellyn turned to me and said, "Look! That old fool would have voted a straight ticket if I had given it to him. He never looked at the ticket I gave him." While we were talking Amador reached the polling place, and just as he was about to deposit his ballot he stopped, turned, opened up the ticket, glanced at it, refolded it, and handed it in.

Yours, truly, ALLEN J. PAPEN.

Mr. BURNHAM. May I inquire if the gentleman who wrote that letter is an acquaintance of the Senator?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I understand the author of the letter is one of the most prominent editors in the Territory of New Mexico. I offered the letter because it was written by an editor, as I have a great deal of confidence in the opinions of editors. They usually are very intelligent men.

Mr. QUARLES. Will the Senator from New Hampshire kindly yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. QUARLES. I am very thankful, I will state, to my distinguished friend, the Senator from North Dakota, because by means of the introduction of his letter he has answered my question. It appears that in this case the emblem was a game cock, the most appropriate one, perhaps, for that locality; and the letter is much more specific in its information than what I was able to gather from the distinguished Senator who now has the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was the Democratic ticket.

Mr. QUARLES. It does not say that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; it does.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The letter shows that the ticket which had the game cock printed on it was discovered by the party who received it to be a ticket that he did not desire to vote. The essential part of the letter is that Martinez Amador, the star witness here, himself voted the ticket which was handed to him, evidently not caring anything about what the ticket stood for, but rather basing his action upon the wishes of the man who handed it to him.

Mr. QUARLES. I think, if I may be permitted to make just one suggestion, that the Senator from North Dakota will agree with me that some of the answers made by this man Amador, if that is his name, would not tend to impeach him, but would rather indicate that he was a man of a great deal of intelligence. Some of his answers there were certainly dictated by very great intelligence, if I understood them.

Mr. BURNHAM. We had, as a committee of course, the opportunity of seeing this man and hearing him talk, and he made the impression upon the whole committee, I think, that he was a man sincere, honest, and informed as to the conditions that surrounded him. Beyond that, there happened to be right by the meeting place of the committee a man who came from my city, Manchester, N. H., a physician, who had gone to Las Cruces for his health, had been there for some years, and was acquainted with Martinez Amador. For the purpose of ascertaining about the man I inquired what his standing was in the community, and I inquired whether he was a man who had the means of knowledge, the opportunities of knowing the conditions and surroundings there, and further than that, whether he was a man whose statements could be relied upon. In all instances I received a favorable answer. So this man has been commended by one whom I personally know, and I should be inclined to think what he has said is to be relied upon.

Those who urge upon Congress this legislation claim, as appears in the report upon the pending bill submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that—

> The faith of the nation was plighted to the people of that Territory at the time of its original occupancy by the troops of the United States, when Kearney, without opposition, occupied Santa Fe in 1846.

The report says:

> He proclaimed that "It was the wish and intention of the United States to provide the people of New Mexico with a free government, with the least possible delay, similar to those in the United States." (Pp. 18, 19.)

In order that we may understand what promise was made in the proclamation of General Kearny, I wish to quote from Bancroft's History of the Pacific States, where that proclamation is given in full. The exact words relating to this subject are these:

> It is the wish and intention of the United States to provide for New Mexico a free government, with the least possible delay, similar to those in the United States, and the people of New Mexico will then be called on to exercise the rights of free men in electing their own representatives to the Territorial legislature. (P. 418.)

I call attention to the words omitted in the report referred to:

> And the people of New Mexico will then be called on to exercise the rights of free men in electing their own representatives to the Territorial legislature.

The free government referred to is a Territorial government, and their representatives are to be elected to a Territorial legislature.

But if any doubt exists as to the true meaning of this proclamation, or if anyone should claim that it contained an implied promise of statehood, we would refer to the instructions given to General Kearny, June 3, 1846, by the Secretary of War, William L. Marcy. I quote the language of his instructions, so far as relates to this question:

> You may assure the people of these provinces that it is the wish and design of the United States to provide for them a free government with the least possible delay, similar to that which exists in our Territories. They will then be called upon to exercise the rights of free men in electing their own representatives to the Territorial legislature. (P. 425.)

If General Kearny obeyed the instructions thus conveyed to him, he could have promised only a government similar to that which exists in our Territories. If he did not obey his instructions, then he was acting without authority and his promises could have no legal or moral force and could be in no sense binding upon this Government.

Again, it is claimed that Congress is bound to admit this Territory because of the ninth article of the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo, concluded February 2, 1848. I shall read that article:

> The Mexicans who, in the territories aforesaid, shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican Republic, conformably with what is stipulated in the preceding article, shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States and be admitted at the proper time (to be judged of by the Congress of the United States) to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States according to the principles of the Constitution; and in the meantime shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, and secured in the free exercise of their religion without restriction.

I have failed to find in the reading of the article anything which suggests what has been claimed by those who are the advocates of the omnibus statehood bill. There is nothing here with reference to a reasonable time; nothing here by which you can infer that it means in the near future. It is simply this: "At a proper time, to be judged of by the Congress of the United States."

It would seem unnecessary to call attention to the words used in this article and their obvious meaning.

Is it not plain that Congress is to be the sole and final arbiter in the decision of this question? Has the Territory met the necessary requirements, and is it now the proper time for admission?

No words of limitation are found in the treaty. Nothing there suggests or implies that New Mexico is to be admitted at any stated time, or even in a reasonable time, or in the near future, but only at a proper time, to be judged of by Congress. That proper time can come (however long may be the period) only when the qualifications of the Territory are such that it is entitled to statehood.

It is apparent perhaps in the course of this discussion—it has been apparent otherwise—that two of these Territories come here with the spirit of demand, as if there were nothing for this Congress to do except to answer affirmatively their request, as if there were no judgment to be exercised about it, no discussion of this matter whatever. I submit that they can not come in this way or in this light. They must come as others have done, by application, asking that they may be admitted to the Union and submitting their cause to the judgment of Congress.

There is, then, no obligation arising from any proclamation or treaty, or from any other cause, that should induce or compel the American Congress to act otherwise than according to its best judgment as to the admission of this Territory.

I have endeavored to give in these remarks a statement of the conditions we found in New Mexico and of the facts bearing upon this important question as they have appeared from statements made and testimony given before the committee, or from such authorities as seemed to be reliable.

Nothing has been presented with any purpose or desire to misstate the true conditions in this Territory, but the facts as they exist have been stated; and these facts, established by overwhelming proof, must stand like a wall impregnable against the present admission of New Mexico.

It is to be hoped, however, that at some future time, and before some later Congress, a condition far different from the present may be shown to exist, and that then this people may be given a place in the family of States.

But that time can come only when the population shall be increased so that it shall bear a just proportion to that of the Republic; when its resources shall be developed more largely; when the people shall be more truly American, and the element which to-day is foreign in race, in language, in customs and habitations shall be radically changed through public schools and American influence; when, if possible, a much larger part of her arid plains, valleys and uplands may be improved, and a supply of water convert them into fruitful fields, some burdened with crops of many kinds, and others shaded by innumerable trees, whose loaded branches bear all the varieties of semitropical fruits; when their flocks and herds, grazing upon better and broader lands, shall increase and multiply; when the products of the mine, the field, and the forest shall bring richer returns; when railroads, extending far and wide, shall bear their surplus products to the markets of the world; when a better and more general education shall unite and elevate this people, and when our institutions and our republican form of government shall be more fully understood and appreciated. Then, and not till then, will this Territory be entitled to statehood. When that time shall come, the crown and scepter which she seeks to-day will be surely granted, and another Senate will gladly bid her welcome to our halls of legislation, to our imperishable Union, and to the companionship of American States.

ARIZONA.

I now desire to call attention to that other Territory, Arizona, and briefly as I may, to state the conditions that exist in that Territory.

After leaving New Mexico we visited several of the larger cities of the Territory of Arizona. We visited Prescott, a city of 3,559 inhabitants according to the last census, a city lying in a valley surrounded by hills and mountains; it was an American city—enterprising, active, progressive. Our time there was occupied in taking the statements of many witnesses from among the leading citizens.

From Prescott we went to Phoenix, a city of 5,544 people, as stated by the census report. Here we found the latest and best development of an irrigation system. Here, too, were a progressive people, and at a reception tendered us, we found citizens of which any place might be proud. Men and women visited the place of the reception that evening who were people of culture, refinement, and intelligence.

At Tucson there are 7,531 people. Here we learned that in this city and its vicinity a large number of Mexicans resided.

Then to Bisbee—a city that has grown up almost in a day and a night, a city developed as if by magic. Encircled by hills and mountains it is a grand mining camp, so designated, so understood; but its population is doubtless eight or nine thousand. It is said that they were not reported at the time of the census. I believe that that place has substantially grown up since 1900. It is there because of the successful development of certain copper mines.

I wish to say in this connection that the appearance of the place and the conditions surrounding it were evidence, to my mind conclusive, that those who are the owners of property, the owners of buildings, understood that their stay might be temporary. The buildings were inexpensive, except a very few, such as hotels and stores, indicating that permanency of population was not expected.

In these several places the statements of many witnesses were taken, including those of census enumerators who were questioned fully as to the manner in which and the faithfulness with which they performed their duties. They were asked in regard to their oath of office and whether they acted with fidelity and in accordance with its obligations.

Their answers satisfied the committee that the census had been faithfully taken. In one instance the enumerator secured the names of people before his term of office began. He hunted for them until, as he said, not a man, woman, or child could possibly be found whose name was not in his return.

Among the 10 census officials who testified was the supervisor, a former Governor of the Territory. I should like to read from his testimony, because he is a representative man, and having been Governor of the Territory his statements ought to be relied upon. He was called as a witness by the committee, and made a statement from which I wish to quote at some length. (Pp. 128, 129.)

F. A. Tritle, called as a witness by the committee, first having been duly sworn, testified as follows:

By the Chairman:

Q. Please state your name and age to the committee.
A. F. A. Tritle; I will be 70 in next August.
Q. How long have you lived in the Territory?
A. I came down here in 1880.

So he had lived in that Territory long enough to become familiar with its people.

Q. You were supervisor of the census for the Territory?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you remember about how many enumerators you had under you?
A. Well, about 100.

So it seems that in the Territory of Arizona for the purpose of getting the census correctly there were 100 enumerators to perform that duty.

Q. You appointed those enumerators, did you not?
A. Yes, sir; except those that were connected with the Indian Department; they were suggested by the Commission.
Q. You had a pretty thorough knowledge of the Territory?
A. Yes, sir; I was governor here prior to that time, and knew more about it in that way than I did in connection with the census. I did not go about the Territory any, as far as the census was concerned.
Q. You did not need to; you knew it?
A. Well, the people that were appointed did that.
Q. So that you were peculiarly qualified by reason of your acquaintance with the Territory to select the enumerators?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. You, in common with all of the enumerators, took the oath—the customary oath to take the census accurately?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. That was done, was it?
A. Yes, sir; that is, to the extent possible.

The meaning of that answer I understand to be that with the knowledge he had of his enumerators he believed the census was taken as well as it possibly could be. Further answering, he said:

You know, as a matter of course, that Arizona covers a great deal of ground, and the area is great, and necessarily some were missed that we would not come in contact with; but they were supposed to take them all, and the presumption is that they did it as successfully as it could be done in a country like this.

A question was put to him in this form:

Q. I understand you to say that the result of the census was substantially correct?
A. Yes, sir.

By the Chairman:

Q. Of course the census records will show at Washington, but how many interpreters did you use?
A. I could not tell you that now. The returns were made that I made, too, and that shows; the data that they got gives everything of that sort.
Q. The people to whom you refer as having been possibly omitted were prospectors, and the like?

His answer I wish to call attention to, because it sheds a little light on the character of prospectors as a permanent population. He said:

Yes, sir; possibly not a very great many here now.

The meaning evidently is that he had no confidence in the permanency of prospectors as inhabitants of that Territory; he said, "possibly not a very great many here now."

A. Yes, sir; possibly not a very great many here now. As a matter of course, take this area, a country that is not densely populated, and you would miss some persons that were out through the country, but substantially the census would be presumed to be correct. It was done in the summer.

LEAVE THE TERRITORY DURING THE HEATED TERM.

There is this to be said with regard to the heated portion, the extraordinarily heated portion of the Territory, that a good many people during the summer were absent, and during the time that the census was taken, possibly; so that there might be a few more people than the census would show.

Here is the statement of an intelligent man who had formerly been Governor, who had full knowledge of the Territory and of his enumerators; he said that there might be a few more people than the census will show, believing, evidently, that only a few were omitted in the census returns.

Q. Absent where?
A. Well, they would go off to where it was cooler.
Q. You mean outside of the Territory?
A. Yes, sir. For instance, you take this country when you get down south in the summer, it would be extremely warm.
Q. That would be people of permanent homes, and sufficient means to go outside of the Territory?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And your enumerators had the data to take those?
A. No, sir; they would not be taken.
Q. If a man was absent and had sufficient means and substance to go away from his home in the heated term, and had his home, or ranch, wouldn't there be anybody there?
A. He would have to answer for himself; and if he was outside of the Territory at the time the enumerator went to his place, he would not be on the roll.

Q. How many would you say there were of them?
A. I would not have any idea of that.
Q. It would be limited, would it?
A. Yes, sir, although some of the sections claim there was a good many people absent. You will come in contact with them when you get to Phoenix, and those places that were hot, and they claim they had a good many more people than were returned.

Not only had we the testimony of witnesses who appeared, as I have stated, before the committee and gave us their evidence fully, but we have other evidence bearing upon the question of probability. I do not know definitely the compensation of those enumerators in all instances. I understand they were paid $5 a day, while they were out in the country, and 3 cents a name in the cities. But this fact is evident, they knew the business in which they were to engage; they understood they were going into certain districts; they knew what their expenses would be; they sought these places I have no doubt, and they were compensated for what they did, and compensated for a full and perfect return, as far as possible, of all the people in their districts. Then, as I have stated before, there was the general interest of the public which would be urging them on to do their full duty, to get every name possible, and to swell in every way that was just and fair the return of the population of the Territory.

Then to my mind it is a little remarkable that while in Oklahoma the assessors have annually taken the census, here where some were claiming that the census was not correct, that the population was double the number returned, there has never, so far as I have been able to learn, been any effort by actual canvass to refute the returns of the enumerators.

It does seem that at least in one city like Phoenix, for instance, where such a great discrepancy is claimed, the citizens would have made an effort to secure an accurate statement of population if there were anything wrong with the census.

It is undoubtedly true that some of the people at Phoenix, some of the people at Tucson, and at Prescott, and Bisbee, possibly were away, as they go away in summer from our cities, perhaps to California, perhaps to the Atlantic seaboard, or to the mountains, to find cooler retreats. Yet the number must have been small. Our own personal knowledge makes certain the fact that in none of our cities is any very large per cent away at any particular time for the purpose of visiting seaside or mountain resorts. Certainly if many were omitted in these cities the opportunity has been given to make it manifest.

But they omitted, it is said, those who were out in the mountains—prospectors, men who were away at a distance and could not be reached. How many prospectors might there be in either of these Territories? There would probably be more in Arizona than in New Mexico, because of the greater extent and value of mining possibilities. But are the prospectors out in the mountains men interested in agriculture and the owners of property who are located in city or town or country? They are a migratory people. They are men who are in this mountain to-day, probably in another mountain somewhat distant to-morrow, and they may be still farther away, and perhaps beyond and outside the limits of the Territory, in a very few days. So, then, that population, whatever it may be, can not be fairly reckoned among the permanent people of that Territory.

When we attempted to ascertain from these 10 census enumerators, who were under oath testifying before us, what the error in the census could possibly be, upon closest inquiry of every one we received these answers: One said that he thought out of, I think, two thousand or more he might have omitted five or six. Another with a liberal view, evidently wanting to be free from any possible mistake, said: "I think there might have been at least a hundred." These were the statements given us as to the enumeration in that Territory.

Now, that leaves the population substantially as stated, 122,931. Here let me call attention to the statement the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] made, of course as he understood it, in which he spoke of the enormous percentage of gain in population there had been according to the census. It was stated, if I remember correctly, that here was an unprecedented gain of 100 per cent. It turns out that from twenty-five to thirty thousand Indians were not reckoned in the census of 1890, but were reckoned in the census of 1900.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the number of Indians reckoned in the census of 1900 who were not reckoned in the census of 1890 must have been exactly the number who, as I understand it, are returned by the census enumerators, and therefore twenty-six thousand and something.

Mr. BURNHAM. If I understand the Senator, he calls the number twenty-six thousand or twenty-seven thousand and odd.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; that is the only difference there could be, as I understand it. I have not looked at it except what the Senator from Indiana said on the floor the other day, and it is doubtless correct. If it be true that no Indians were included in the census of 1890, but the number of Indians returned were included in the census of 1900, then of course the number included would be exactly the number of Indians the enumerators found—twenty-six thousand and whatever the odd hundred amount to—and that number being deducted from the total population would show exactly what the increase was with the census taken on the same basis on which the census was taken in 1890. I made a calculation of it, which shows that the increase was 60 per cent, instead of something over a hundred per cent, as I supposed it was, which I think is a pretty fair increase for a stagnant community.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio does not, I think, disagree with the statement I made. I think I stated the number at from 25,000 to 30,000, because of some confusion in the statement which I received from the Census Bureau as to exactly what the increase was. There was some doubt whether it was 26,000 or 27,000 or 28,000.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me just a moment further, there was no confusion whatever as to what the census reported. The confusion was as to whether or not the census had made a correct report, and that arose from the fact that the Secretary of the Interior had reported a larger number, thirty thousand and something. But it was the number returned by the census that were included in the 122,000 population.

Mr. BURNHAM. I desire at this time, so that we may be absolutely certain about these matters, to read what I referred to as leaving some doubt in my own mind as to just what the difference was. This is a letter from the Acting Director of the Census, Edward McCauley, dated January 12, 1903, directed to me:

CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 12, 1903.

Hon. HENRY E. BURNHAM,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your verbal request of this date, I take pleasure in transmitting herewith a statement, showing the distribution of the illiterate population of Arizona at the censuses of 1890 and 1900.

The population of Arizona included in the general enumeration in 1890 (59,620) was exclusive of 28,469 reservation Indians and 154 white persons on Indian reservations, specially enumerated.

That seems to be a very plain statement.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. BURNHAM. Then follows this:

That is to say, the population of Arizona, contained in the general report on population for 1890, included only 1,512 civilized Indians, as against a total of 26,480 Indians, reservation and otherwise, included in the census of 1900.

The 1890 report on population does not contain a separate statement of illiteracy for the several colored elements of the population similar to that shown for 1900 in the table inclosed.

Very respectfully,
EDWARD MCCAULEY,
Acting Director of the Census.

Mr. FORAKER. Then, as I understand the statement, the Senator will observe that it is exactly in accord with what I said a while ago, that 26,480, if that is the correct number, were included in the 122,931 which make up the total population.

Mr. BURNHAM. Yes; and as I understood the Senator, after he had made some calculation during his speech, the increase was 57 per cent.

Mr. FORAKER. I said 57 per cent upon the faith that the figures, as given by the Senator from Indiana, were correct. He said that 28,000 to 30,000 Indians were included; but when I came to think of it afterwards, I saw there could not be included, as I understood the census, more than 26,480; and deducting 26,480 from the total population would leave an increase that was the equivalent of 60 per cent. I did not go into small fractions.

Mr. BURNHAM. The area of this Territory is 113,030 square miles. This would make the number of inhabitants less than 1.1 per square mile. If the people of all the cities in that Territory were equally distributed over the country, instead of being located, as practically one-fourth or one-fifth of them probably are, in the cities, and if there were, as it has been claimed here, an average of five in a family, there would be five square miles of territory for each family.

I desire to call attention specifically to what has been said before in regard to the rules or requirements that have obtained when Territories were to be admitted as States. The report of the committee refers to the ordinance of 1787, and particularly to the 60,000 population clause. But when the Senator from Ohio referred to it, he, as I understood him, stated that the great principle—the great rule—was involved, not in what appeared in the report, but in what appeared in the declaration of the ordinance. I wish to read more than perhaps is necessary of that declaration, so that its connection and relation will be understood. Section 13 is as follows:

And for extending the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty, which form the basis whereon these republics, their laws, and constitutions are erected; to fix and establish those principles as the basis of all laws, constitutions, and governments which forever hereafter shall be formed in the said Territory;—

I wish to call particular attention to these words—to provide also for the establishment of States and permanent government therein, and for their admission to a share in the Federal councils on an equal footing with the original States at as early periods as may be consistent with the general interest.

That part to which I would give emphasis is in the closing words—"at as early periods as may be consistent with the general interest." If this is the rule, as I understand the Senator from Ohio in advocating this bill to affirm, then I submit that we are to consider first and most of all the general interests, and the general interests can be no other than the interests of the whole Republic.

So, then, with this rule uppermost in our minds, the question arises whether this small population, to which I will refer later on, certainly considerably less than 100,000 white people, is to come here with a representation equal to that of the greatest State in this Union.

Now, I submit we are to consider, just as the Senator has stated, the general interests of the whole Republic. I wish to read particularly in this connection the first rule, with reference to population:

And whenever any of the said States shall have 60,000 free inhabitants therein such State shall be admitted, by its delegates, into the Congress of the United States on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government, provided the constitution and government so to be formed shall be republican and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles; and, so far as can be consistent with the general interest of the Confederacy, such admission shall be allowed at an earlier period, and when there may be a less number of free inhabitants in the State than 60,000. (Art. V.)

Under this ordinance it is indeed true that a Territory with 60,000 free inhabitants had a right to come into the Union. It had a right to submit to Congress the question whether or not it had 60,000 free inhabitants, and upon a decision in the affirmative, it was entitled under this ordinance to admission. We find in the Constitution, which is the supreme law of the land, that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." The only tribunal is the Congress, and no Territory has a right to demand admission until it has the necessary qualifications, to be judged of by Congress.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I call the Senator's attention in this connection, in view of what he has just said, to the fact that the ordinance of 1787 was more than a mere organic law. It was a contractual obligation, perpetual, between the thirteen original States and the Territories to which it was applied as an organic law; and because it was of that contractual character the Territories to which it was applied had the right to demand admission, a right recognized whenever it was asserted, whenever they could show that they had 60,000 free inhabitants. If the Senator has the ordinance before him he can find that provision. I know it is there. I was just looking for it.

Mr. BURNHAM. In the edition which I have the declaration referred to is on page 420, and on page 424 the article of——

Mr. FORAKER. I will find it in a moment, and then I will call the Senator's attention to it.

Section 14, on page 420, is the section that I refer to. If I do not too much interrupt the Senator, I will read it. It reads as follows:

It is hereby ordained and declared by the authority aforesaid that the following articles shall be considered as articles of compact between the original States and the people and States in the said territory, and forever remain unalterable, unless by common consent, to wit.

And so on. So my contention is that it was not a mere organic law, but it was in the nature of an obligation which was binding upon the thirteen States that were governed by the Articles of Confederation, and also a binding obligation upon those thirteen States when they framed and adopted the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Even if that were true, as I pointed out the other day to the Senator, the reason for the committee's reference to the ordinance of 1787 was to show that the opinion not of the framers of the ordinance, but of the Congress that adopted it was that even in those States there should be some fair proportion of population compared with the rest of the country. So that even if it were a compact it would strengthen the point more than otherwise, showing that it was not only their opinion, but they put it in the nature even of a compact that a State should not be admitted regardless of numbers.

Mr. FORAKER. No one contends for that. Of course, there must be some population in the Territory before there can be an admission to the Union. But what I was saying when I had the floor as to the rule deduced from the ordinance of 1787 by the committee was that the ordinance had not established any such rule as that which the Senator contended for in his report, for even if they had provided, without any qualification at all, that there should be 60,000 people in the Territory before it could be admitted to the Union as a State, they meant that to apply to the last as well as to the first of the five Territories provided for, whenever they should have 60,000 people.

We all know that it was sixty years after 1787 before the last of the five Territories of the Northwest, provided for in the ordinance of 1787, did have 60,000 people, and they must have known when they framed it that during that sixty years the rest of the United States would be growing rapidly in population, just as it did grow. Therefore they could not have intended to lay down as a rule of percentage that no Territory should be admitted to the Union as a State until it had a population that would be in the same proportion to the entire population of the United States that 60,000 was to the population of the United States in 1787, when it was less than 4,000,000.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Even conceding, for the purposes of the argument, that to be true, then it would come down to what would be the fair estimate which the Congress that adopted the ordinance thought would be the population when the last of those States was admitted. That would establish the proportion at that time. Of course, as I pointed out to the Senator the other day, the reason why the proviso which the Senator very properly called attention to was put into that ordinance, that if at any time a fewer number than 60,000 were there and the State with that fewer number could be admitted with safety to the interests of the rest of the nation, it might be done, was because the original draft of the ordinance presented by Virginia provided for the small number of 20,000, and the Continental Congress, when it was presented to them, declined it among other things upon that ground and that there would be 10 small States instead of 5. Congress took the opposite view and held that in the future there should be large States instead of small States, and that instead of 10 States there should be not less than 3 nor more than 5. That was one reason why they introduced the proviso. But all through the whole thing, culminating in the ordinance itself, there runs the idea that there should be a fair proportion of population in the State as compared with the rest of the nation; and it was even proposed during the debate upon this question that any new States which might come in should have one-thirteenth of the population of the Colonies. That is the rule suggested by the committee.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I do not know that it is material to discuss the matter, although it is very interesting to discuss it. There is really no difference, as I understand it, between us. I rose simply to call the Senator's attention to the fact that this was more than an organic law, for it was only in that way that he seemed to be treating it. I wanted to point out that it was an actual contractual obligation, to use its own language. It was a compact between the thirteen original States and this Territory of the Northwest, and no matter what somebody might have proposed or what was originally thought to be done, the thing they finally did is what we are concerned about. What they finally did was to say that a Territory should be admitted into the Union as a State whenever it might be done consistent with the general interest, and that these particular Territories should be admitted whenever they might show 60,000 free inhabitants, or at any earlier time than that if in the judgment of Congress it was proper so to do.

In the case of Ohio they did admit her when she had only 42,000; in the case of Illinois when she had only 34,000; and if they had admitted Wisconsin when she had 60,000 the percentage would have been, I think, only about twenty-five one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the population of the United States. I figured that out, but I have not my notes with me and therefore I can not be accurate about it. I think if Wisconsin had been admitted with 60,000, as she had a contractural right to be, her total population would have been less than one-fourth of 1 per cent of the whole population of the United States.

That was the rule in so far as any was established by the ordinance of 1787. Then when later we came to the case of Oregon, to which the ordinance of 1787 had been extended and applied, she was admitted when she had only 52,000, and the population of the country was at that time something like 30,000,000. I can not carry these figures accurately. I did not suppose it was important.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I suppose it is not so very important; and yet in conceding to the Senator—and I will take only a moment—that it established a rule for 60,000, and that the idea of the proportional amount is to be excluded from it, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the reasons which led up to that are very important. The Senator says what is important is what was finally done, but the Senator as a lawyer knows——

Mr. FORAKER. No; what I said is, that what we are concerned about in determining the rule that is to be deduced from the ordinance of 1787 is what they actually did in the ordinance of 1787, not what they thought of doing.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But I submit to the Senator we can understand better what was actually done if we find what were the reasons leading up to it. Now, one of the reasons which led up to this was (and my memory was refreshed upon it by the suggestion of the Senator concerning Ohio) that the men who were at that time pouring into this Northwest Territory were the Revolutionary soldiers. They were referred to by Washington, as I pointed out the other day. In speaking of the settlers of Ohio Washington said that he knew a great many of them; that they had been in the Revolutionary army, and they had been schooled in all the great discussions that went on during the Revolutionary period; that they were precisely the same men who fought the Revolution and who sent to Congress and to the Constitutional Convention, the men who framed our Constitution, and all that sort of thing. I think Washington puts it something like this, that he believes in all the history of the world there never was just exactly the same quality of men, of such excellent material for founding States as those who settled Ohio and the rest of the Northwest Territory at that time.

When this ordinance was adopted there was already this stream of immigrants of an extraordinary and peculiar kind. Therefore it was, Mr. President, that they put in the proviso, and therefore it was that it was perfectly proper, in view of these extraordinary circumstances—so extraordinary that Washington himself called attention to them—that a less number than 60,000 might be admitted, or, even if the Senator says the arbitrary rule of 60,000 should be applied, that it was finally adopted.

Now, I submit that that kind of immigration—the kind of men who were then on the ground, who had helped to establish the Republic in the first instance—and the rule which was deduced by the reason of their being there is not the rule, if you apply it as an arbitrary matter to 60,000 or a less number, that should be applied to Territories such as we have now under consideration.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. There is this weak point in what he suggests: There was no tide of population for Washington to speak about rushing into Ohio when the ordinance of 1787 was adopted. It was not until the next year, 1788, that the first settlement was established at Marietta, Ohio, and civil government was there instituted for the whole Northwest Territory. It has been stated that nearly everybody residing in the Northwest Territory was present at the inauguration, and yet there were but 54 white men, I believe, all told, present to see Arthur St. Clair inaugurated as the first governor of the Northwest Territory.

It is true that Ohio was fortunate, I think, as the Senator suggests, in her early settlements. But the settlers came in after that. The ordinance of 1787 was an inducement to these people to go into the Northwest Territory and make settlements there. The first settlement was made by the Connecticut people in the northeastern part of the State, in what is called the Western Reserve. Then a little bit later, coming down the line on the Pennsylvania side, settlements were made by the Pennsylvania Germans, and then at Marietta was made the settlement in 1787. Then at Gallipolis the French settlement was made a little later, and then at the mouth of the Scioto River, the Virginia military district, extending north in the State up as far as Chillicothe and beyond, but not so far as Columbus, was settled up by the Virginia people. Then at Cincinnati by New Jersey people, under the leadership of John Cleves Symmes, a settlement was made. Then Congress set aside what was called the military reservation at Columbus, Ohio, for the benefit of the officers of the Revolutionary Army. Thus were made a number of settlements, and it was of that population that George Washington spoke some time after the ordinance of 1787 was adopted.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Is the Senator from Ohio through?

Mr. FORAKER. I was not quite through, but I am willing to be interrupted, if the Senator desires to interrupt me.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have to say just this: I have read, not within the immediate near past, but I have read, and it is very distinct in my mind, the letter of Washington concerning those settlers. If I am not very much mistaken—and I want to refresh my memory upon that point as soon as I go home—Washington's letter was written at the time when Congress was considering the final acceptance of the ordinance of 1787; but, whether that is true or not, the Senator will find upon reading the literature of that time and the letters of those who were interested in that ordinance when it was first presented, that precisely the tide of immigration, which the Senator describes as having occurred later, was taken into consideration and was contemplated, and they took it as a thing which had actually occurred. I suppose they had in mind the equity rule as applied to population perhaps, that what ought to be done was considered as already done.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I want to throw in a saving clause before I get through, for, after having been mixed up with the census the other day, I want to be a little careful.

My recollection—and I now state it—is that there was no population settled in Ohio until after 1787. Therefore I apprehend the letter of George Washington, to which the Senator refers and with which I also am familiar in a general way, although I do not recollect its date, must have been written subsequent to the adoption of the ordinance of 1787.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That may be.

Mr. FORAKER. But, as I said a moment ago, I feel like apologizing for taking any of the time of the Senate in speaking on these points, because we are interrupting the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM], who is making a very interesting and able address.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not want to take up the time of the Senator from New Hampshire, but there is one point the Senator from Ohio brought out which I think does bear upon this particular discussion, and that is the Senator stated that these settlements were induced by the ordinance of 1787. I am willing to give all possible weight to that statement of the Senator, but I do not suppose the Senator means us to understand that that was the thing which chiefly induced settlements. The nature of the country, I think, was what induced them. We always find in the question of immigration that, after all, good natural conditions are the things which control. The form of government, of course, has something to do, much to do, with it, no doubt, but the fertility of the soil, the well-watered nature of the land, all the human conditions, in fact—the kinds of crops that can be raised, the pleasant nature of the climate, and everything that goes to make human life worth living—those, I think, are the fundamental things that induce immigration and settlement.

I said that the form of government has, of course, something to do with it; but I think the Senator will modify his statement that the ordinance of 1787 was the thing which induced this immigration. The chief things were the elemental and natural conditions. That is the reason I rose to call attention to the fact that that is one of the very things on which the committee stand on this question. It has called attention to the case of Arizona and New Mexico as contrasted with Oklahoma or with a State like Ohio or any other State where, without statehood, great immigration is bound to occur.

Mr. FORAKER. No doubt that is true. Natural conditions have much to do with population, and in a certain sense they have all to do with it; and yet it is a historic fact, with which we are all familiar, that Manasseh Cutler and his associates, having organized the Ohio colony and induced Congress, under the Articles of Confederation, to adopt the ordinance of 1787, withheld their enterprise and would not make any settlements until they had the ordinance of 1787, and none of these settlements were inaugurated until after that.

Mr. President, the reason why the admission of Ohio was hurried, as we all know when we come to the real facts, with which we are all familiar, was not because she was soon to have a great population, but it was because Thomas Jefferson had been elected President of the United States by a very narrow margin, and he wanted to be strengthened in the next electoral college. That is the reason why there was hurry to make a State out of Ohio.

The Virginians who went over there were great politicians. They hurried the holding of the constitutional convention; and when the convention was in session less than thirty days, having framed a constitution with which they were satisfied, and not having time to submit it to a vote of the people before the next session of the legislature, which had been called by Arthur St. Clair, they proceeded to promulgate it themselves and declared it adopted; but it never was adopted by the consent of the people. The Declaration of Independence was to that extent forgotten for the time being in the making of our first constitution, and it was all hurried—that is a well-known political fact—in order that the State might be admitted in time for the next Presidential election. It was, in large part, because there was that precipitancy in organizing that State that it has been a political battle ground from that time until the present.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, that is an exceedingly interesting piece of information, which I confess I did not know about. I did not know that politics had anything to do with it, I confess, but if that is the case—and I have no doubt it is—it may, perhaps, throw some light upon the original draft of the ordinance of Virginia, which, I believe, was drawn by Thomas Jefferson, which provided for 10 States and the number of 20,000 inhabitants, instead of 60,000, as a prerequisite for admission.

But that could not be the reason why the admission of Illinois was hurried.

Mr. FORAKER. The admission of Illinois was hurried because it came in later, at a time when the slavery question was attracting attention, and when States were admitted in couples.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. In 1818.

Mr. FORAKER. Illinois and Mississippi came in practically together, just as Maine and Missouri came in together. There was an effort to maintain the equilibrium between the free and slave States and not allow one section to gain a preponderance over the other. That was the case for thirty years.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course, I take it that the Senator——

Mr. HOAR. I wish to make a statement, if the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] has got through. I do not wish to interfere with either him or the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FORAKER. So do I.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Ohio will pardon me, I rose with reference to the last observation that the originating of the ordinance of 1787 by Mr. Jefferson had some connection with a desire on his part for political support. I do not think there is the least evidence of that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That statement was not made by me.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] spoke of the coming in of Ohio in 1803. I have no doubt he stated the history with absolute accuracy.

I did not understand the Senator from Ohio to say that in the draft of the original ordinance of 1787 Jefferson had any such purpose.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; he did not say that.

Mr. HOAR. But I understood the Senator from Indiana to say that the statement of the Senator from Ohio led him to believe that when Mr. Jefferson drew the ordinance of 1787 he had a similar design.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; Mr. President, what I said, or what I meant to say, was that that piece of information of the Senator from Ohio, about the reason for the early admission of Ohio, was new to me and very interesting. I did not know that there was any politics in it, I confess, but I was looking at it as a historical matter.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me one observation about that, I made as thorough a study of that history a few years ago as I could make of any historical matter.

Mr. Jefferson certainly had not a thought of any personal or political advantage in 1787, for, indeed, Mr. Jefferson's ordinance was drawn in 1783. It followed the cession of the great Northwestern Territory by all the States. Perhaps I may go back one moment without worrying the Senate. Maryland refused to agree to the Articles of Confederation at all—she was represented in the Continental Congress by a sort of sufferance—unless the other States who claimed the northwestern lands—which included Ohio, Pennsylvania, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Virginia, and I think New Jersey had some claim, but of that I will not be absolutely sure—would cede their title. Maryland claimed that the Northwestern Territory really belonged to the Crown; that it was Crown property wrested from the Crown by the common efforts of all the colonies, and that it was not reasonable that this great territorial possession should be won at that cost for the benefit of individual States. Those States accordingly ceded their possessions to the Confederacy.

I regard that cession by Virginia as one of the greatest acts of disinterestedness in all our history. It was a sacrifice of her claim, which was certainly as strong as any other, and probably the strongest, and it was so considered. The Northwestern Territory bordered on Virginia, from which Kentucky was afterwards taken.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And first named Franklin.

Mr. HOAR. No, Franklin was the State of Tennessee.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is true; it was Tennessee and not Kentucky. I had forgotten for the moment.

Mr. HOAR. Jefferson, and also Carrington and Grayson—three of the important Virginians—and Richard Henry Lee were strongly opposed to slavery. When this cession was completed, Mr. Jefferson drew the ordinance of 1787, which in its original form has been alluded to as making provision for several States—I have forgotten how many.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Ten.

Mr. HOAR. Yes, ten. But that was very distasteful to the other Southern States, especially North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, and Mr. Jefferson's ordinance got no support whatever in the Continental Congress, and it died. Mr. Jefferson then went off to France.

The ordinance was framed by Mr. Jefferson before the treaty of peace in 1783. He could not possibly have been thinking of his own personal or political advancement at that time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is clear.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Jefferson only ventured to provide that there should be no slavery in that territory after 1800. Even that turned out to be so distasteful that the ordinance was dropped. Then it was brought forward again by Rufus King, of New York, with a different arrangement. That utterly fell dead, and the Continental Congress of 1786 adjourned, leaving that to perish with the session. That was the condition of things when Rufus Putnam appeared on the stage. His company of veteran soldiers was organized in Massachusetts. The house where he planned the scheme is now standing in Rutland, Mass. He had had a desire to colonize this Northwest Territory with veteran soldiers, and General Washington was the only person that Putnam could get to take the slightest interest in it. There are in existence a great many letters between Putnam and Washington, in which Washington says he has done his best, but can not get Congress to take any interest at all in the matter.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. At what time did Rufus Putnam organize that movement?

Mr. HOAR. In 1787.

That being the condition of things, this ordinance utterly dead, Putnam appeared at the doors of the Continental Congress by his agent, Manasseh Cutler, and said: "We have got a company organized in Massachusetts; we will pay you a million and a half dollars for your land; we will establish a settlement of veteran soldiers"—and some of the most famous soldiers of the Revolutionary war, Barton of Connecticut, Israel Putnam's sons, and others were amongst them. He said: "They would be a shield to these States against the Northwestern Indians, who are the most brave and formidable Indians on the continent, and they will also put a stop to this desire which exists in the Kentucky country to go off into a confederacy with Spain, so that they can control the mouth of the Mississippi, and they will discharge your obligation to these soldiers for their half pay."

Manasseh Cutler appeared to the Continental Congress. General Putnam had had for years his scheme in his mind, one of the conditions of which was that slavery should be inexorably prohibited. That is as far back as 1782 and 1783. Then by his agent, Cutler, he appeared at the door of the Continental Congress, and they brought forward this old dead ordinance. Mr. Jefferson was at that time in France as our minister, as everybody knows. They told Cutler that they would report it the next day. Thereupon Cutler, supposing the matter was all right, went off to Philadelphia, where the Constitutional Convention was in session. When he came back he found they had not reported the clause prohibiting slavery. He immediately sent around his cards with "P. P. C." upon them, and said he was going home, and that his soldiers could buy land in western New York and in Maine, if they could not buy any other.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. They were in Ohio at the time.

Mr. HOAR. No; they started the next year. They told him if he would stay another day they would come to his terms, and the next day Nathan Dane, to whom very erroneously the credit of the affair has been given, moved from the floor the amendment excluding slavery, the ordinance having been reported without it. The original ordinance and the original amendment in Nathan Dane's handwriting are over in the Congressional Library now. That was adopted by a unanimous vote, with the exception of Abraham Yates, of New York, who dissented. Then Putnam started with his colony of veteran soldiers and went down the Ohio River to Marietta and founded Ohio. This company contained many of the most famous soldiers of the Revolution—Parsons, and Varnum, and Return J. Meigs, and Putnam himself, and Tupper, and the sons of Israel Putnam, and Abraham Whipple, the daring sailor.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That was at what date?

Mr. HOAR. That was on the 8th day of April, 1788. That is the date of the foundation of Ohio. Then——

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me to correct him——

Mr. HOAR. It was in 1788.

Mr. FORAKER. I understood the Senator to say that the settlement was at Marietta in——

Mr. HOAR. 1788.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. April 8.

Mr. FORAKER. The settlement was made on that date.

Mr. HOAR. The settlement was made in 1788; the ordinance was passed in 1787.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator said April 8, 1787.

Mr. FORAKER. I said that in 1788 Arthur St. Clair was inaugurated governor of the Northwest Territory at Marietta.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, that is the story. I state it because this man has never had his due. It is a little curious that in the Ohio State convention in 1802 the same General Putnam, then an old man, was a member. Of course a great many people had come in from Kentucky and the South as well as from the North, and the son of Manasseh Cutler, Ephraim Cutler, the agent of Putnam, who was sent to Congress to make these terms, was a delegate in that convention. He was sick in bed at his hotel. Being also a delegate and member of that convention, Putnam appeared at Cutler's room at midnight and told him that he must get up at whatever risk, because they were going to establish slavery by the Constitution. The two men went over together to the convention and the provision establishing slavery was defeated by one vote.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has established the fact that any deduction I may have drawn from the statement of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] that Ohio was taken in at the time she was to further Mr. Jefferson's political efforts—I say I think the Senator from Massachusetts has established the fact that the deduction I drew from that concerning the original draft of the ordinance of 1787 was incorrect.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not differ from anything the Senator has said as to the original drawing and adoption of the ordinance of 1787.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I know; but the Senator from Ohio gave out the piece of information that Ohio was hurried into the Union because Mr. Jefferson wanted to strengthen himself politically, and I said——

Mr. FORAKER. Perhaps I ought to qualify that and say not Mr. Jefferson himself, but the adherents of Mr. Jefferson were the men who hurried the holding of the constitutional convention and promulgated a constitution for Ohio without submitting it to a vote of the people.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, if I may repeat, I have not the least doubt of the absolute accuracy of the statement of the Senator from Ohio. I made the statement because the Senator from Indiana seemed to think that in the original draft of the ordinance by Mr. Jefferson, which was in 1783 or thereabouts, he had some personal or political motive. That I wished to question.

Mr. FORAKER. I agree entirely with the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think the Senator from Massachusetts is entirely correct about that. I say that the Senator from Ohio gave this rather novel and curious piece of information, which I did not know about—novel to me, but not novel to the Senator.

Mr. FORAKER. It is not novel; it is a historic fact.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I mean novel in the sense, of course, that it was new to me; and, therefore, in the course of the debate I drew the possible inference that one reason for the peculiar drawing of the original draft of the ordinance which made us have 10 States, and the reason for which I never could see, might have been that, and then the Senator from Massachusetts cleared the whole thing up.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me, I will call his attention to something else in that connection, which may be novel—the Territorial legislature at one time undertook to bring the Territory of Ohio into the Union as two States and, in that behalf, established a State line running north from the mouth of the Scioto River up to its source, and from thence to the southwest corner of the fire lands, which belonged to Connecticut, near Sandusky, Ohio. They were going to have two States, but Congress would not allow it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was not versed in these niceties of learning concerning Ohio's settlement, although I had the honor of being born in that State; but I think the Senator from Massachusetts has also established the fact, by the peculiar minutiæ and accuracy of his information upon this subject, that Washington when he wrote this letter, which, as I say, I think was some time in the neighborhood that we speak about, did have in mind these very men. The Senator from Massachusetts has called attention to the fact that the only person that Putnam could get to correspond with him or to take any interest in this subject at all was Washington himself, who had commended him and the men who were going to settle in Ohio. And it was to these men he referred when he spoke of the exceptional material for statehood that existed in the character of the immigrants there. So that the question of the dates, two or three years earlier or later, would not make any particular difference. Whether they were there at that time or not, their entrance was contemplated by Washington and by themselves for two or three years before, and they had had correspondence about it. Therefore, I submit to the Senator that it is an element worthy of consideration that one of the reasons why all of these States carved out of the Northwest Territory were treated as they were in every particular was what Washington pointed out as the exceptionable character of the immigration.

Mr. BURNHAM. I am not aware that there is any difference between Senators as to the construction and true meaning of the Ordinance of 1787.

I desire now to call attention to Article IX of the treaty with Mexico. The article is as follows:

ARTICLE IX.

The Mexicans who, in the Territories aforesaid, shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican Republic, conformably with what is stipulated in the preceding article, shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States and be admitted, at the proper time (to be judged of by the Congress of the United States), to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States, according to the principles of the Constitution; and in the meantime shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, and secured in the free exercise of their religion without restriction.

The particular fact of interest in this article is that under this treaty the two Territories named were received by cession, and that whatever may appear in other treaties, or in the ordinance, we find here the authority by which we are to be guided in the consideration of the pending question, whether the proper time has yet arrived, in the judgment of the Congress of the United States, for the admission of these Territories.

Arizona has a population of less than twice the 60,000 named in the ordinance, while the United States to-day has over 76,000,000 people, nineteen times greater than at the time the ordinance was adopted, yet Arizona, with this small population, now seeks admission into the Union.

Another rule has been stated, the rule applied to Kansas in 1861. It may not have been followed, and I am not aware that any distinct rule has been followed in the practice of the Congress of the United States with reference to the admission of Territories. For many years prior to 1861, when Territories applied for admission, the question was what would be the effect of such admission upon the relations of the North and South; what would be its bearing upon what was understood then to be the equilibrium between these two sections of the country. In the course of some effort to ascertain what the discussion was when these Territories were admitted, I have found very little except that which related to the old question of slavery.

If that rule were adopted the requirement for Arizona would be a population of 194,182. Her white population is less than 100,000, and the query now comes, while the United States in its population has increased two and one-half times since 1861 and multiplied its resources by at least six, whether or not, under these conditions of population and of resources, Arizona has reached that standard which would entitle her to admission into the Union.

In this connection I am thinking of my own State, of my own county of Hillsboro. The number of white people in the whole Territory of Arizona is less than the number of inhabitants in this single county in the small State of New Hampshire.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I might say to the Senator in answer to that suggestion that the population of the single county in which I live is greater than the total population of the State of New Hampshire.

Mr. BURNHAM. I am very glad to hear it. What would be its relation to the Territory of Arizona?

Mr. FORAKER. It would be much greater, but we are not jealous of Arizona on that account.

Mr. BURNHAM. I hope you are not jealous of New Hampshire.

Mr. FORAKER. No, indeed, we are not. We are proud of New Hampshire, and I took occasion to say the other day, what I may repeat, especially since I have listened to the very able speech of the Senator from New Hampshire, that no small State has ever, as a rule, made an unworthy contribution to the statesmanship of this country. When you have a small and an intelligent electorate, you always get able United States Senators. Almost without exception, if not entirely without exception, will this be found true as to New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, and Delaware—when she sends any at all.

Mr. BURNHAM. Of course upon that point I can not disagree with the Senator, but I do not like the inferences he draws.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. DEPEW. On the question of population, I have here figures as to five Congressional districts in the State of New York. The lowest number of inhabitants in the one which has the least of those five is 240,000, and the highest has 375,000, as against 122,931 people who are to have two United States Senators in addition to a Representative in Congress in case this bill passes.

Mr. BURNHAM. Perhaps it has no bearing, but it seems to me desirable to bring clearly to the minds of all the small population, relatively, in the Territory of Arizona. For the purpose of bringing out this fact I have attempted to ascertain what would be the result to the Senate of the United States if the old State lines should be obliterated, and should we take our whole country and divide it into States, not with the same territory, but with the same population as Arizona, and each one of these States should send to Washington two Senators. I do not believe it has occurred to any Senator what a large number would be thronging in at the doors of this Chamber. If I have made no mistake in the reckoning, there would be something like 1,240—1,240 Senators of the United States here if the rest of the country were represented as Arizona would be, if admitted.

Now, in connection with the meager population of this Territory, we think of the power and control that might possibly result. How has it been in the past? We think of 1876, and how the votes of Arizona, if they could have been cast one way or the other, would have determined the election of a President of the United States; how, here in the Senate, our foreign policy, our treaties, often by a very narrow margin, are settled one way or the other; how it is in legislation that bills of the greatest importance, relating to matters that concern the whole nation, are sometimes passed by a very small majority. And yet we are giving, not necessarily, but in a voluntary way—it seems to me prematurely—such a controlling power to so small a number of people.

I wish to say something here in regard to the character of the population of Arizona. I desire to state in the beginning that the people of Arizona whom we met, as in New Mexico, were intelligent, refined, and cultivated, but we did not see representatives of all the people. The population is divided into whites, 92,903; the Indian population is very large, 26,480; negroes, 1,848; Japanese, 247. Of the native born there are 70,508; of the foreign born, 22,395. The total population, not including Indians, is 96,431, less, let me repeat, by 16,000, than the population of the particular county in New Hampshire to which I have referred.

Now, it may be of interest for us to consider how this white population is divided. The number of males is 55,230; females, 37,673; the excess of males is 17,557. Now, of white and colored, including Indians and all, there are 71,795 males, 51,136 females, a difference or excess of 20,659 males.

While this inequality may be found to some extent elsewhere, it is a significant fact and bears upon the question which we are discussing as to the permanency of population. We find that there is an excess of white males of 17,557, and I believe this means a less number of homes, a less number engaged in agricultural pursuits owning their farms, and a less number permanently abiding in city, town, or country. There is less stability and less permanency in such a population, and this fact is worthy at least of consideration.

There are a large number of Mexicans residing here; in the committee's report the number is given as 28,931. But the difference between New Mexico and Arizona is that in Arizona the Mexicans do not and can not control.

ILLITERACY.

In regard to educational qualifications, there are some facts which I wish to state, and these are principally taken from the census. The number of illiterates 10 years of age and over in 1900 was 27,307, and the per cent was 29. In 1890 the per cent was 23.4. In 1880 it was 17.7.

I think it is only fair that the statement should be made that there were a large number of Indians reckoned in the census of 1900 who were not reckoned in the census of 1890, which undoubtedly had something to do with the result. But it seems very striking that illiteracy should increase in Arizona from 23.4 per cent in 1890 to 29 per cent in 1900. While there is, indeed, this explanation, so far as the last two censuses are concerned, I can not quite understand, if their educational advantages were what they ought to have been during the twenty years back, when the Indian element was not reckoned, why from 1880 to 1890 the percentage of illiteracy should have increased from 17.7 per cent to 23.4 per cent.

If, as we say, our institutions are founded upon education, if the success of our republican government rests upon the intelligence of the people, it is a matter of great consequence whether these people are growing rapidly out of the condition in which they have been or whether they are remaining substantially as they were. And the question to-day is whether they have reached that high standard of intelligence, that freedom from illiteracy, which is or should be required by the Congress of the United States.

Now, to illustrate the inacuracy of statements sometimes made by men who are intelligent, honest, sincere, and yet mistaken, I wish to refer to the testimony of a gentleman who appeared before us, who was born, I think he said, in the shadow of Bunker Hill monument, lived in Boston and vicinity, had been in New York for quite a time, and had come to Phoenix, Ariz., for reasons of health, a gentleman whose appearance before the committee certainly commended him in the highest degree.

I believe he stated what he thought to be the truth when he said "only 4 per cent of our people are illiterate." Against this statement is the census return which shows conclusively that in 1900 the per cent of illiteracy among those 10 years of age and over was 29, more than seven time greater than the witness stated.

I find from the census that the number of those 10 years of age and over, who in 1900 could neither read nor write, was 26,700—28.3 per cent. In 1890 it was 21.9 per cent. The increase here has been almost 7 per cent. The number of those 10 years of age and over who could not speak English in 1900 was 27,468—29 per cent; in 1890, 28.23 per cent. Now, as I say——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I no doubt misunderstood a remark of the Senator, and if so, he can explain it; but if I did not misunderstand him, he can correct his own statement. He said there were a certain number who can not speak English. Now, if the Senator is referring to illiteracy, the illiterates are those who can not read or write English or any other language whatever; and if that test were confined to the reading and writing of English alone, it would be very heavily increased. I was following the Senator carefully, but he was going on with such great rapidity in his statements and figures that I did not catch just what he did say about that point.

Illiterates are usually regarded as those who can not read or write the English language. As a matter of fact, the census test is those who can not read or write the English or any other language, and therefore in a population where there is a heavy foreign element—the word "foreign" being used in the sense of people who do not speak English—the percentage would be enormously increased. It is the opinion of everyone on the committee that if in New Mexico, for instance, where the percentage of illiteracy is thirty-three and something, or about that, the test of writing and reading the English language was applied, the percentage would be much more than doubled—perhaps 70 per cent. I do not know whether I caught the Senator's statement. The Senator did say something about reading and writing English, and I wondered whether or not it was on the question of illiteracy.

Mr. BURNHAM. The statement, of course, was taken from the census report and from the heading of the report, which was "ten years of age and over; can neither read nor write." The number I gave was 26,700; 28.3 per cent.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That means read or write any language.

Mr. BURNHAM. Any language, as I understand it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So if it was English, the percentage would be very much increased.

Mr. BURNHAM. Yes. It says who "can neither read nor write," which, I assume, of course—and I think I am correct—means any language whatsoever.

Now, as I said, in that Territory, as in New Mexico, there is no question but that they have good public schools and are now giving attention to their school system. The objection is that they have not yet pursued that line far enough to remove the difficulties which stand in the way of admission to the Union. They have a normal school; they have one very large university; they have high schools in the cities, and it was our privilege to see the schools in Phoenix, and the pupils there would compare favorably with any of our pupils in the Middle West or the East.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. RAWLINS. As bearing upon the question of illiteracy in the Territories, I should like to invite the attention of the Senator to the fact that until a Territory is admitted to the Union as a State, no public lands, or proceeds of public lands, are available for the purposes of education. That is one of the disadvantages of the Territorial condition. The population, many of them pioneers, are compelled to support education by direct taxation, or by contributions from their pockets, while if admitted into the Union as a State, a large portion of the public lands is devoted to the cause of education. Hence the admission of Arizona and these other Territories into the Union would tend greatly to the amelioration of their condition in regard to education.

Mr. BURNHAM. I am not aware that that is a fact in regard to these Territories. I have in mind Oklahoma. I understand that her school lands have been leased, and that she receives a very large and substantial income from the leasing of those school lands. I supposed that the same might be true of Arizona or New Mexico, although my attention had not been called to it.

Mr. RAWLINS. I know the condition which I described did apply to the Territories. It is possible there may have been some special legislation in regard to Oklahoma, but in my own State, when a Territory, none of the public lands were available for educational purposes until the Territory was admitted. I think that is true of Arizona, unless the condition has been recently changed by legislation.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator mean to say it is not competent for the legislature in a Territory to raise by taxation any funds for school purposes?

Mr. RAWLINS. No; the proposition I made was that none of the public lands in these Territories are available for educational purposes. In all the public-land States sections 16 and 36, and sometimes four sections in each township, have been dedicated to the cause of education; but those lands are not available until the Territories have been admitted into the Union as States, unless, as possibly in the case of Oklahoma, there has been some special legislation.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But still that would not prevent the Territorial legislature from raising funds by taxation.

Mr. RAWLINS. That is what I said, that if they educate their children it must be by direct contributions from their pockets. There are no public lands or no public funds available for that purpose.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That, then, would be merely the normal condition of settled communities. The legislature has the power to raise by taxation any amount of money it thinks wise for public-school purposes. It is not prevented because it is a Territory; and that is a point very often made with reference to the matter. I do not understand that to be the Senator's contention. As a matter of fact, a Territory, with the exception of going into debt over 4 per cent, or of any of its municipalities, has as much self-government in through its legislature and things of that kind as a State has.

Mr. RAWLINS rose.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I yield to the Senator, although I was going to make another remark.

Mr. RAWLINS. I want to complete the statement in regard to this point. As a matter of fact, I am informed that Arizona has never had made available to her any public lands within her borders for educational purposes, but that what schools she has maintained she has maintained by direct taxation or voluntary contributions to that end.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is, taxation provided for by her legislature.

Mr. RAWLINS. Taxation provided for by her legislature.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That would be just the situation we are in in the older States.

Mr. RAWLINS. No; the State of Indiana——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. We had public lands; we had school lands.

Mr. RAWLINS. Every State in the Union has had funds growing out of the disposal of public lands—section 16 or two sections or four in each township. The burden of education has not fallen directly upon the people, and the funds for that purpose were not raised by taxation. But in Arizona and New Mexico, although there was a special act in 1898 under which a portion of the public school lands might be made available in that Territory, no public lands are available for purposes of education. So, in reply to the argument which was being advanced by the Senator from New Hampshire, it may be said that the condition of illiteracy would be ameliorated upon the admission of those Territories into the Union as States.

It is true of my own State that while a Territory and until it was admitted funds were raised by direct taxation. Upon its admission as a State four sections out of each township became available for educational advantages. That has been a great relief to the people. The people who come to these Territories are pioneers; their condition financially is not of the best; there is a great struggle for existence, and in addition to the other hardships entailed upon them in a Territory is that of providing for the education of their children. Where there are large tracts of public land which might be available to that end they are withheld from them. Upon the admission of a Territory into the Union as a State they become available. Hence in this respect, as in many others, the admission of these Territories into the Union as States will tend to promote and hasten their progress educationally and otherwise.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. As a matter of fact, I understand—and if I am not right I am sure the Senator will be informed immediately, since we see the source of his information close at hand—there have already been grants of public lands, at least with reference to New Mexico, and there is a bill now before the Senate, which I tried very hard to get the Senate to take up, at the request of the Delegate from that Territory, last session, reported favorably by the Committee on Territories, to permit the Territory to lease certain of the public lands which belong to its public institutions for the purpose of building new buildings and for other educational purposes.

Now, if that is not true, however, it would seem at first glance, considering the land in these Territories just as the lands are in any of the States, that there would be force in what the Senator says. But of course these public lands would have to be taken out of lands that are now Government lands, and until there is further irrigation and until the storage of water in Arizona and New Mexico becomes a success (and even then I am inclined to think the lands susceptible of irrigation are pretty largely taken up), the lands that could be set aside for school purposes would not bring anything, because they are not productive lands.

Mr. RAWLINS. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. RAWLINS. That can not be the case in the Territories, because in every Territory certain sections are reserved. Sections 16 and 36 and in some cases four sections out of each township have been reserved. They were reserved originally. They are not subject to disposal. They may be, and many of them are, so situated that they are the most valuable lands in the Territory. Private ownership of them can not be acquired. They can not be leased by the Territory. They are dead property.

In my own State, which was organized as a Territory fifty years ago, some of the very best lands in the State, four sections out of each township, were reserved. When the State was admitted, some of the counties were the owners of large tracts of land in the very richest part of the Territory. There was one section in the immediate vicinity of Salt Lake City, and there were other sections where the land was most valuable. So a considerable fund was at once available for educational purposes by reason of the admission of the Territory to statehood.

So the school lands in these Territories have not been taken up. They may be along the streams, where they may be readily irrigated and reclaimed. In fact, some people may be in possession of them without contributing anything in the way of consideration or rent. That is true in most Territories.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not think that can be the case here, because their system of canals is built over the irrigable land for which there is now sufficient water. Worse than that, there is not sufficient water, as the testimony shows, for the canals already constructed.

Now, if the Senator will look at the map which Professor Newell, the hydrographer of the Geological Survey, submitted as a part of his testimony, he will see (and if he will read the testimony himself what he sees will be confirmed) that the portions which can be irrigated and made useful in Arizona are very limited at the present time; that they are along the Salt and the Gila and in the neighborhood of Yuma, on the Colorado River. It is stated in that testimony that all this land has been taken up. As a matter of fact, the testimony further shows that while the canals already constructed cover perhaps a larger area, they had enough water this year to irrigate only 185,000 acres out of a total acreage of some seventy-two or three millions.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Just a moment, if the Senator will allow me. Suppose one or two sections or a half dozen sections do lie along these streams. Still, as the irrigation is at present, as the dams are at present constructed, unless vast storage reservoirs are built and made successful the area is comparatively limited. I hope and believe that will be done, but it can not be done in the near future, because if they should go to work right now they could not get it done very soon. Even if that were true there would not be a great deal of land which would be of any value for school purposes, because the great extent of the Territory is away from the streams and waterways and is of a character with which the Senator is familiar. It consists of mountains, and it consists of great plains where there is no water, and you could not sell the land because nobody could use the land. That is the point.

So the point which the Senator very clearly makes—that these lands would become available for school purposes—loses its force when we consider that while there may be a great extent of square miles, that Territory is not fertile nor susceptible to human uses. The Senator will see that that is the case if he will read the testimony already given and before him or within his reach.

Now, another thing, Mr. President. If the claims of even the most enthusiastic advocates of statehood be true—and it is to their credit if it is true, and I prefer to believe it true than otherwise—they already have a pretty well-developed school system. They have schoolhouses, they say, and they have a large number of teachers. The point which the committee makes, especially in regard to New Mexico, is that they have not made the progress in the past which we might reasonably expect from a candidate for admission to statehood in the Union. They are now getting a fair start, and the committee proceeds to describe in language just as strong as the truth will admit the excellent nature of some of their schools. It is stated by the superintendent of public instruction for New Mexico that in some of the schools they do not lack schoolhouses and they do not lack teachers, but in some of the schools Spanish is taught exclusively, because the teachers themselves speak Spanish and they can not get any English-speaking teachers.

But now, conceding all the Senator says for the purposes of argument—of course I do not concede it as a matter of fact—it still is true, if the claims of the advocates of statehood are true, that they already have a very considerable and a very perfect school system, and that school system is beginning its work. Our argument is, Why not let it conclude, or at least proceed further in the work of Americanizing this population and lifting it to a level, as can be shown by census figures, with the rest of the country before they come in upon an equality with the rest of the States?

I wish further to state in this connection, while I am on my feet, that as one of the members of the committee—and I think we all feel the same way—no person more ardently hopes that they will not only improve in education, and believes it, but that they will also, by finally establishing an irrigation system, open up much of the land which is now not available to human or any other use, so that it will be productive and bring forth an abundance of all those things upon which people live, and therefore will lead to an increase of their population. It is not true now. The argument I made upon this particular point is that until that does become true and until a fair proportion of population is established in these Territories with reference to the population of the rest of the States, and until the work of education which is now beginning and which is being pushed forward is completed, they should remain a while longer under Territorial government.

Further, it would appear to a person who thinks about it, that if they are so earnest in their desire for statehood, the very fact that they are kept out for this reason, among other reasons, would be a very powerful spur and stimulant to them in forwarding all the more vigorously their educational work. I think the Senator will, perhaps, admit the force of this argument.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. RAWLINS. As I listened to the response of the Senator from Indiana to the suggestion which I made that this Government was interested in the education and progress of all its people, including those in a Territory as well as those in a State, it appeared to me that we use an argument resulting from a condition which we ourselves have created, namely, a measurable degree of illiteracy among these pioneers in Arizona, when we withhold from them the means which are offered to people of every State to advance the cause of education.

There is one suggestion. Not only will the lands which are now, it is reasonable to say, of no value become available for educational purposes, but those lands would constitute a fund in the hands of the State the utilization of which might result in conserving the water supply.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. How, if the Senator will allow me?

Mr. RAWLINS. If the Senator will permit me, I have lived all my life in conditions not entirely dissimilar from those in Arizona, for during the past six or eight years there has been a recurring period of unusual drought throughout the intermountain country, and measurably so in the rest of the country. Observations in India for nearly a hundred years and also in my own State have demonstrated that these recurring periods come in cycles of about eleven years each. For a portion of that period there is little rainfall. There has been a minimum of rainfall throughout the mountain country during the past two years. In the next four or five years perhaps the rainfall will increase.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator excuse me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. RAWLINS. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I merely desired to ask a question. In speaking of rainfall does the Senator refer to the rainfall over the whole region or simply in the mountains or the sources of streams?

Mr. RAWLINS. I mean the precipitation.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The general precipitation?

Mr. LODGE. The general precipitation?

Mr. RAWLINS. Not the local, but the general precipitation. The moisture which rises from the earth of course falls in the higher mountains in the form of snow, particularly in the winter time, and it comes down in avalanches and fills up the gorges, and constitutes a reservoir, so to speak, and during the hot season it constitutes our source of water supply for summer. That is true in Arizona and perhaps in a less degree than farther north, but it is measurably true there.

Now, during the past two or three years in my own State there has been an outcry on account of the scarcity of water, but it will disappear in two or three years, and we will have an abundance of water where there is now a scarcity. Those periods have come in cycles, as I pointed out. I have had occasion to examine the conditions in India, where they have had longer experience than perhaps in the other countries where they resort to irrigation. They have taken observations, and they find that there the recurring period of drought, the minimum of water supply, comes in about eleven years. That condition has prevailed there, and there has been a record kept for about one hundred years. In the past fifty years the same condition has been noted in my own State, where similar observations have been made.

Hence it is unfair to Arizona to base her permanent condition upon that of the past year or the past two years, because during that period there has been a minimum of rainfall or water supply throughout the entire region of the West.

While I am upon my feet I might call attention to another matter, which was referred to yesterday, about torrential rains. Of course, that proposition has no significance with reference to irrigation except in one respect. The so-called cloudbursts occur in the higher mountains. The winds carrying the vapor suddenly encounter a colder atmosphere in the higher mountains, and it is at once precipitated, causing a torrential storm, and the water comes down in a great flood. It can not be preserved, of course, up in the mountains where it actually occurs. It falls down upon the cliffs. But lower down, if reservoirs or lakes or basins are constructed, those waters may be caught and conserved. That can be done in Arizona. It can be done anywhere. In that manner those waters can be preserved.

The only point I desired to make now was that if you admit Arizona and New Mexico, the lands now reserved and useless for school purposes will be a fund in the hands of the new State.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. How will they use them? That is the point.

Mr. RAWLINS. They can use them. They would be valuable lands if supplied with water. Irrigation reservoirs can be constructed by parties having sufficient funds to construct them properly. These lands may be utilized for that purpose. Lands now worth nothing may be worth $50 or $100 per acre when thus supplied with water, and they would then constitute a fund. It would be an invitation to capital to do this work. People wanting homes stand ready to take these lands and pay for them when they are once supplied with water.

Of course that is the only method by which Arizona can be built up. Through State organization that fund which is now dead may be vitalized, under intelligent administration, and the only intelligent administration is local administration. I have no confidence whatever in the Federal Government ever inaugurating or carrying into execution a system which will lead to the reclamation of these lands in the West, because it has no instrumentality, it has no business capacity as a national organization, to do this work. But organizations locally interested in the development of the Territory can do it, and the best way to accomplish that result is to admit Arizona and New Mexico into the Union.

It is true their population may not be up to the standard in all respects of older communities, but the speediest way to obtain that end is to clothe them with responsibility and they will take up the exercise of the duties which will thereby devolve upon them, and out of that exercise will grow strength, and out of those conditions there will be progress. Out of the utilization of those lands will come education; and out of these communities which you now describe as unfit for association in the citizenship of the Republic you will find a people ultimately who will compare favorably with the best people in this nation.

After long years of experience why should we still handicap them? We pledged ourselves to admit them. If they are ever to be admitted they are now as fit for admission as they will ever be. The addition of a few thousand of population and a diminution of the degree of illiteracy a per cent or two is not going to make any very material difference. The question is now presented whether these Territories shall be retained for all time in a condition of Territorial vassalage or be permitted to enter upon that career to which they are ultimately, at least, destined.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah always makes a plausible argument, and to-day, I think, he has made the best-worded one I have ever heard him make. I assert also a good deal that the Senator has said, but I think he gets his conclusion before his premises.

The Senator admits that the land is worthless, that progress is impossible without irrigation, and that irrigation can only come by the establishment of storage dams, and that, therefore, the rendering valuable of the land can only come by that means.

Now, Mr. President, the point is why should not that be done; why should not this land be improved; why should not immigration be increased there, and while that is going on why should this illiteracy not be progressively destroyed, and why would not these all be conditions leading up to statehood instead of the reverse?

Mr. President, there is nothing in the Territorial situation which prevents them from doing that as Territories any more than as States, except one consideration only, the Senator will admit, and that consideration is, that while they are Territories neither the Territory itself nor any of its municipalities may go into debt beyond 4 per cent of the assessed valuation of its property, and that when it does want to go in debt beyond that rather high limit it must come to Congress to get its approval.

It occurs to me that for a young and growing community, even where the lands are fertile, that is a very good safeguard. That safeguard was inserted because of experience in certain States where the land was very fertile and where it was not in the arid region at all. If it was useful there, and if it grew out of the experience of Kansas, Nebraska, and States of that kind, how much more forcible is it in States which have to contend against unusually hard conditions?

Therefore, if it be an advantage (and I think I can show to the Senator that it will be a disadvantage with reference to these Territories), the only advantage would be the removal of the 4 per cent limitation. Now, that is not necessary whenever any useful purpose is to be served, because the Congress of the United States is not going to deny to the legislature a confirmation of any law they pass to better their condition in a proper manner. As an illustration, there is now before the Senate, reported favorably by the Committee on Territories, a bill authorizing the bonding of property in Maricopa County for the building of the great storage dam there. That bill, if it had not been for this discussion, would long since have become a law. So the Congress of the United States, exercising merely its checking power in order that certain abuses, of which the Senator well knows, as we all know, may not occur, will never exercise that power when it would not be to the injury of the Territory itself to do it.

There is nothing standing in the way of building these dams; there is nothing standing in the way of the storage of these waters. The Congress of the United States does not stand in the way of a Territorial form of government, save as the limit of 4 per cent upon the assessed valuation of their property stands in the way; and the Senator, I hope, would not wipe that out.

Therefore, I say, the Senator gets his conclusions before his premises. Why not extend this system of irrigation? For one I am willing to say now—and I hardly ever make a pledge concerning my future action—from my observation in these Territories, if the question came before the committee of which I have the honor to be a member, or before the Senate if I was not a member of the committee, I would probably vote in favor of any well-considered scheme for increasing the local irrigation in any one of these Territories, because it is the only thing, as the Senator well says, upon which their future can be built. Then, when these lands that are fertile are irrigated, when water is applied and they have been made fertile by that process, when settlers have come in, when in the meantime the processes of education have gone on, certainly it would be true, to put it very mildly, that the conditions for statehood would be better. Would it not?

Now, Mr. President, just one more word with reference to this subject. I am inclined to agree with the Senator in what he said concerning the temporary nature of the severely arid character of the Territories in the last few years. Although there are two theories about it, nevertheless it is true that Arizona and New Mexico are in what are known as the arid belt. There is the arid belt, and there is the semihumid belt, and there is the humid belt. The Senator's State is partly in the arid belt, but there is a strip of semihumid belt in the Senator's own State. These, as I think Governor Otero's report shows, are well within the arid belt, so called and designated scientifically. So this arid condition is no temporary matter.

What I think the Senator intends to refer to is that the increase of this natural aridity for the last few years is a temporary matter. I sincerely hope it is, because certainly the waters down there have been shrinking, and nobody wants to see them shrink any further. I should be delighted, and so would everybody else on this side of the Chamber, if the waters would swell and stay swollen, so that we might have in those Territories wherever there is a water course a second Nile, and that the agricultural resources of this Territory might be increased indefinitely. I would be very glad of that.

On the question whether it is a temporary matter, I am inclined to agree with the Senator, but men who have given much thought to this subject and whose business in life this study is, have come to a different conclusion, and that, too, even in the semihumid States. For instance, I will state what I have read, some time or other, I do not know when and I am not sure where, but I am sure of what I say. I think it is in Newell on Irrigation, a most admirable book of information and beautifully written, where he speaks about what the Senator and myself know as men who in our youth lived out in that country, the rainbelters. The rainbelters were people who in western Kansas and similar States found that when they got there the rains were descending quite as much as in their own States, and not only for one season and one year, but for many successive years, so that they took up their homesteads and plowed their fields and planted their grain and raised abundant crops. But it was not a permanent condition. The natural semihumid condition returned, and suddenly these farmers found that they had merely barren land upon their hands, because they did not have enough water.

Now, during this series of years, and a series of years, too, so long that it justified them in thinking it was permanent, prosperity was so great, although it was temporary, that they could command upon their farms more favorable terms in mortgages, and those mortgages were sought after by mortgage companies, and mortgages on western Kansas farms were sold all over the Central West and all over New England.

I was there during a portion of the time when the natural condition returned and much of the land which for a few years had plenty of water went back to its natural condition. The farmers found that they were without any means to pay their mortgages and that they had to return to lands where they could have this thing permanent.

So I say that the experience during a long series of years, even in semihumid, not in arid, but in semihumid regions, shows that it may be after all that the condition of which the Senator speaks may be permanent. I am inclined to think, too, as the Senator says, that it might occur four or five years even in the semihumid region. It has occurred as long as ten years at a time when there would be an abundance of rainfall, and that belt of rain would extend gradually year by year. The Senator remembers that, and that it gave rise to many theories, as, for instance, that the planting of trees in the ground would advance the rainfall, that the breaking up of the ground would have something to do with it, etc. So the rain belt extended, but it did not extend permanently.

Therefore it may be that the shrinkage of the water in the streams of which the Senator speaks is the natural arid condition. However it may be, it is certainly true that the failure of water down near Phoenix is very serious, and nobody recognizes it more so than the people there. Now, if the Senator and the other Senators will vote for the bill to authorize Maricopa County to establish this dam, it may be that this serious condition will in the future be prevented, because these waters surely can and must be conserved. There is not any use of their being wasted. The conservation of these waters, however, is a serious thing.

That brings me back to the final conclusion. They have full power over this subject except in one thing, and that one thing is the power to go in debt beyond 4 per cent. The reason why that was put in was because of the melancholy experience of the people of Kansas and Nebraska and similar States where, by voting subsidies to build railroads and other things of that kind, the people became indebted so that they could not free themselves from debt for a generation. It was out of that fact and the fact of the rain belters I spoke of a moment ago that certain political disturbances arose six or eight years ago. The people found themselves tremendously in debt. They had been induced to vote large subsidies to build railroads with. The railroad builders got the railroads and the people got the debt.

So that sad experience caused President Harrison, when he was a Senator and chairman of the Committee on Territories, to write and have passed by the Senate this 4 per cent limitation. Now, is it wise to remove that bar? Did the Senator read the testimony of the first witness taken in Oklahoma, who stated that the people even in Oklahoma did not really want statehood now, because they were so prosperous, and they had railroads, and were getting more built by the capital of legitimate investors, whereas if this 4 per cent limitation was removed they would have the experience that certain other States had, the experience of having their people induced to vote heavy subsidies, which they would find it hard if not impossible to pay, while if they remain in their present condition for a few years they would have all the railroads they wanted without the debt.

I think, Mr. President, one of the serious considerations of this bill and one which I intend to address myself to during the course of this debate perhaps, and which I will mention here, since the Senator brings it out, is that the bill if passed will take from about the people of New Mexico and Arizona the shield of the 4 per cent limitation, and will permit any exploiter who is sufficiently skillful to induce the people of counties and cities and of the Territories themselves to vote great subsidies in the aid of railroad schemes, the result of which will be that the railroad promoters will have the railroads and the people will have the debt, and it would be a debt from which down there they could not rid themselves in a generation, and perhaps not for a hundred years.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, as I was stating when interrupted, the condition of the schools in Arizona at the present time is encouraging. Many of the people who visit Arizona remain, having gone there on account of their health, and many of them are very intelligent people, coming from different sections of the Union. Others have gone there for business purposes. From these came the delegations which were presented to the committee as representative of the Territory. But, as I have said, if New Mexico and Arizona could have the full number of their population made up of such intelligent and cultivated people, the conditions would be very different from what they are.

But, after all, there is the question of population and its inadequate number, which, it seems to me, stands in the way of the admission of both these Territories. There are certain facts relating to the condition of Arizona, I think not yet referred to by anyone, that I wish now to present, and these concern the land itself and its improvement.

IRRIGATION.

The land not appropriated in Arizona to-day amounts to 67,068,563 acres, and the land not even surveyed is 54,612,869 acres; yet that portion of the country was settled before our New England.

It is important in this connection to consider the present conditions of the Territory and its probable future so far as the occupations of the people are concerned. So our attention is called to the means by which they obtain a livelihood. They are located there, as in New Mexico, in the very midst of the arid region, where, as is conceded by everyone, there can be no successful prosecution of agriculture except through irrigation, and that only through the impounding of water. We believe that the future prospects of this Territory are matters about which we may well be concerned at this time. Certainly it is not in a proper condition to-day for admission as a State, whatever may be its future.

The natural rainfall, as I have said, is not sufficient. I refer to the report of the committee, where a statement occurs with reference to the rainfall in Arizona. In the report the committee states that no relief can be expected by rainfall, and this fact also appears in the testimony of Mr. Fowler, of whom I have spoken, in Professor Newell's testimony, and in the statement of Mr. Heard, who is one of the water commissioners at Phoenix. The committee's report states:

This also is shown by the precipitation throughout the Territory, which is—

	Inches a year.
Fort Mohave	5.99
Gila Bend	5.86
Phoenix	7.22
Tucson	12.11
Yuma	2.97

In the neighborhood of the mountains, of course, it is heavier, being:

	Inches a year.
Bisbee	17.06
Fort Apache	20.94
Flagstaff	22.24

These mountain precipitations are no substantial aid to agriculture except in affording water for the streams.

The same observations as to the nature of this rainfall that have been made as to New Mexico are even more true as to Arizona. (P. 17.)

In this connection I would call attention to a statement made by the Governor of Arizona, on page 30 of his report, as to the snowfall. He says in that report that the supply of water for the steady flow of streams depends greatly on the amount of snowfall. I wish to bring to the attention of Senators the fact that this supply is unreliable. Here is a statement as to the snowfall during the month of February, 1901, and the month of February, 1902:

Snowfall in inches.

Station.	1901.	1902.
	Inches.	Inches.
Flagstaff	84.3	13.1
Fort Huachuca	5.5	.0
Natural Bridge	21.0	.0
Oracle	15.0	.0
Pinal Ranch	10.0	.0
Prescott	25.0	Trace.
Showlow	29.0	Trace.
Yarnell	13.0	Trace.

And here is a note in the Governor's report:

The snowfall during the winter months furnishes in great measure the supply of water for the steady flow of streams. The greatly reduced amount of water available for irrigation during the season from January 1 to June 30, 1902, was obviously caused by total lack of snowfall during the winter months.

The difference in the snowfall between 1901 and 1902 makes it very plain as to the uncertainty there is in the amount of snowfall on which irrigation so much depends.

As I think has been stated before, irrigation is not a new enterprise in the Territory of Arizona. Centuries ago some progress had been made along these lines by the Indians and those who preceded them; but the best system, as all concede, is that at Phoenix.

Now, there is this fact in connection with Arizona that I wish to state. The total irrigated area now is only 185,396 acres, although irrigation has been going on under American control for thirty-nine years; and all that is under actual cultivation, including the Indian lands, is only 254,521 acres. The total amount of land improved, exclusive of Indian lands, is 227,890 acres.

It appears to have been the case at Phoenix that very much more land had been provided with canals than could be supplied with water.

Mr. Fowler, the gentleman to whom I have referred, states that, while at Phoenix water had at one time been supplied for 250,000 acres—

This last year we did not irrigate in this valley exceeding 90,000 acres—90,000 to 100,000 acres. (P. 138.)

Speaking of his own property, he says he had 280 acres that he did not put water on at all for three years, because he did not have it; that he was paying for 160 acres of water, but that he did not put more than 40 acres under water, because he lacked the water. So, even at Phoenix, in a place where irrigation is carried on at its best, we find that when a landowner had purchased and paid for the right to the use of water for 160 acres, he could obtain water for only 40 acres.

The result of this is certain loss; and Mr. Fowler, whose testimony was given with so much intelligence that I wish to refer to it again, states, on page 139, that a considerable acreage of oranges and grapes of his own which he wanted to save was lost; and that is true of other orchards at Phoenix.

Professor Newell says——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator said he was going to quote from Mr. Fowler's testimony.

Mr. BURNHAM. Yes; I have quoted what he said about a considerable acreage of oranges and grapes, which he wanted to save, but lost.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. For the want of water?

Mr. BURNHAM. Yes; and I think there is a further statement later on in the testimony.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. To use his expression, if I remember it correctly, "Water is king."

Mr. BURNHAM. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And that they could not do anything without water.

Mr. BURNHAM. That appears in Mr. Heard's testimony.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator will permit me, the whole situation as put by the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] is that everything of their present prosperity and growth depends upon the perfection of the system of irrigation. Nobody doubts that if that should be perfected—though that is a question for the future, and Professor Newell testifies upon that point—a great deal of the land there may be brought under cultivation—though a very small fraction compared with the entire area of the Territory. That is stated in the committee's report, and it has been stated in the course of the debate, and privately by some of the Senators, that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], in his speech, argued that there are conditions there which preclude any development at any time in the future. It is just the reverse of the situation as claimed by that Senator; and all of us on this side of the statehood question agree that the question of development in the future, just as the question of present prosperity, depends upon the conservation of water, and the conservation of water is a very large undertaking. It involves the expenditure of great sums of money; it involves a very considerable period of time.

Now, suppose that should be a failure—Professor Newell testifies that it is speculative, and we all of us most earnestly hope that it will be a success—but suppose it should not be a success; suppose there are not enough flood waters in the Salt River or the Gila River to make it a success—and that is the testimony of the Director of the Geological Survey, who says it is problematical—then we should perhaps have the condition that we had in Nevada, where, when the mines were exhausted, the population decreased.

I call attention to the fact at this point that I learned the other night in private conversation with a Senator who was here at the time Nevada was admitted that Nevada came here with a great and powerful delegation—and I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to this—that there came here from Nevada the year Nevada was admitted a large delegation (I think the Senator heard the same conversation that I heard), with figures to show that Nevada had a population of 90,000 and a voting population of 40,000, and upon that representation claimed admission, when, as a matter of fact, the census showed that Nevada had a population of something over 6,000; then it grew to 60,000; and then, with the working out of the mines, it decreased to its present size, something over 40,000, with 18,000 voters; which shows that if it be true that irrigation, which Professor Newell says is problematical, or at least a question for the future, should happen to be a failure down there—and it is not a success yet, except in a limited way—then the same thing which has occurred in Nevada will occur in Arizona.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me to introduce some figures?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. In the territory acquired by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo there were 110,700 square miles. When Nevada was admitted, October 31, 1864, she had a population of 6,857.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; and they claimed 90,000.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know what they claimed. Did they claim 90,000?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. They did; and it was stated in the presence of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] and myself the other night by a Senator who was then a member of this body that delegations came here when Nevada applied for admission claiming that they had a population of 90,000 and a voting population of 40,000.

Mr. SPOONER. In 1890 they had a population of 45,761 and in 1900 a population of 42,335.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Showing a decrease.

Mr. SPOONER. Showing a decrease since the State was admitted into the Union thirty-eight years ago.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Showing that statehood has not increased the population.

Mr. SPOONER. Showing that area does not constitute the necessary qualification for statehood.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; and in the poem describing "what constitutes a State" it is nowhere stated that mere square miles constitute a State.

Mr. SPOONER. And also showing how dangerous it is to admit into the Union a Territory in that region upon the assumption that statehood will take to it adequate population which it does possess as a Territory.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; and that is the very point that I tried to bring out with reference to what the Senator from Ohio so well said this morning, that the ordinance of 1787 was the inducement which brought immigration to Ohio. I admitted that was one inducement. The other inducements for immigration were, as I pointed out, the natural conditions of the soil, the water, the rainfall, and all the human conditions. Those are the real things.

Mr. President, that brings us to the point made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS], to wit, that statehood would in some mysterious way bring population to those Territories. Has statehood brought population to Nevada? On the contrary, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] has shown that its population has descreased in spite of statehood, simply because there was not any place for the people comfortably to live, except in the Reno Valley and other irrigated portions of the State. There are in Nevada 110,700 square miles. Anybody who has been over the Southern Pacific road, which is the only railroad running across the State—and that brings me to a point that I want to animadvert upon right here, although I intended doing so when I was answering the Senator from Ohio the other day—knows the character of that soil.

In that immense territory the population—and there are scores of cities in the State of the Senator from Ohio and in most of our States having a larger population than the total population of the State of Nevada—amounting to some 40,000 inhabitants, are mostly confined to a little area where there is water, where the soil is fertilized and vitalized by water, and where they can raise something to eat. Those valleys are beautiful and productive, but very small. Simply because you put the ægis of statehood over 110,000 miles of territory which is arid does not bring people there. Men are not going to take their wives and families and settle down on the bad lands of Nevada just because you call it a State. They go where they can have plenty; they go where they can have comfort; and when the conditions which bring comfort and plenty disappear, people leave. That is why it is that we find that the population of Nevada has decreased, because there were mining camps there which unfortunately filled with water, and I am sorry they did, and others which gave out, and I am sorry they did; and when they gave out, the conditions which brought population passed away, and when the reason for population passed away, the population passed away. Did statehood retain it? If statehood did not retain it, how will statehood bring it?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. We people in the West are a very hopeful people. A year ago, or a little less, Congress passed a national irrigation law, and we of the West are hopeful enough to believe that the time is not far distant when there will be an addition to the population of Nevada as a result of the operation of that irrigation law.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I ask the Senator a question right there?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Just at that particular point I would ask the Senator a question. Suppose Nevada was not now a State, would the Senator vote for Nevada's admission upon the hope that the irrigation law would at some future time people it, or would the Senator wait until it was peopled?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I would vote for the admission of Nevada if I thought she had the population, and the——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Just as she is?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. And prospects which warranted her coming into the Union as a State.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; that is not my question. I say to the Senator, take Nevada with its present population and its present circumstances, would he vote now for its admission as a State if it were now a Territory upon the hope that at some future time the national irrigation law would bring a larger population? Would he do that?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I did not rise to be cross-questioned in this manner.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I rose merely to state that those who favored the national irrigation law were hopeful that the time would come, and that it is not far distant, when there will be an addition to the population of Nevada of twenty-five, and perhaps fifty, thousand people in the Humboldt Valley as a result of the operations of the irrigation law.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from North Dakota allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator think we ought to admit States on hopefulness of the operation of the irrigation law?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The condition of Arizona is far different from the condition which the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Indiana have described as existing to-day in Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. Has that been described?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It has been described to the detriment of Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. Then it was described by somebody who knew nothing about it.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Probably so. I can not vouch for the knowledge of the Senators who have described it.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think the Senator will say that when he learns who it was who described it. I called attention to the fact that Nevada was admitted October 31, 1864. I also called attention to the fact that the population of Nevada at the time of admission was 6,857. I think that is a mistake.

Mr. STEWART. That is a mistake.

Mr. SPOONER. I also called attention to the fact that in 1890 the population was 45,761, and that the population in 1900, according to the Twelfth Census, was 42,335; and that the area in square miles is 110,700. That was all I desired to say, but the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] was saying that he thought the irrigation law would probably very greatly increase the population of Nevada.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. We all hope that is so.

Mr. SPOONER. And the very great wealth of Nevada, which is now being developed, will also have the result, I hope, to increase the population of Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. Will not the Senator from Indiana indulge me a moment? Somebody who knows something about this subject ought to be heard concerning it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes, I will yield to the Senator from Nevada in a moment; but first let me complete the statement. The Senator from North Dakota said statements had been made to the detriment of Nevada. A statement was made by the Senator from Wisconsin and I added a statement that merely because it was called a State was not a fact which would induce a man to take his wife and children and put them down there in any portion of a Territory where there were not human conditions, where they did not have water and could not raise food and could not raise herds. I suppose the Senator will admit that the mere fact of statehood would not do that.

Further, and then I will yield to the Senator, I want to know if it is not the Senator's own opinion, ratified by the Senator's past able and statesmanlike acts in this particular, that Nevada ought to have been annexed to Utah or to California or to some other State? Did not the Senator himself make efforts in that direction?

Mr. STEWART. I never suggested and never thought of annexing Nevada to Utah, but I was willing that Utah should be annexed to Nevada. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator was willing that they should be joined?

Mr. STEWART. After I came to the Senate I took steps in that direction to the extent of trying to add a part of the Territory of Utah to Nevada after it had become a State. I was anxious to have the northern portion of Idaho annexed to Washington and the southern portion to Nevada, and I drew a bill, which was introduced here and reported when I was not in the Senate, having come on here for that purpose, and it passed both Houses, annexing the northern portion of Idaho to Washington and the other part to Nevada.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. STEWART. I only have a moment myself, but I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to present another question that was presented to my colleague, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], and which has been transferred for answer to the Senator from Nevada. The question was whether or not he would vote to admit Nevada as a State if he had to vote on it to-day?

Mr. STEWART. I would to-day, but I would not have done it at the time it was admitted.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Although the Senator at that time was one of those who asked for its admission?

Mr. STEWART. No.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Was the Senator not one of the first Senators from Nevada?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. A Senator who was here at the time of the admission of Nevada described to me the Senator's very able and enthusiastic efforts in that direction.

Mr. STEWART. No; not in that direction.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Was the Senator against it?

Mr. STEWART. I took no action.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator was willing?

Mr. STEWART. I was willing when the considerations were presented, but I was not willing until there was an enabling act passed, and it was represented that it was necessary for Nevada to be admitted in order to carry out the reconstruction legislation which was then contemplated. Nevada did then adopt a constitution and came in under the invitation of Congress, but nobody ever came here and asked for admission at all. It was never suggested.

As to Nevada, at the time it was admitted it had a greater population than 60,000. What was the date of the census from which the Senator from Wisconsin read the figures?

Mr. SPOONER. The figures I read were for the year of Nevada's admission into the Union. According to the book from which I read, the population was 6,857, but I think that is an error.

Mr. STEWART. That is an error. In 1864 there was a great addition to the population of Nevada, which amounted to upward of 75,000.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It was claimed that there were 90,000 people there.

Mr. STEWART. There might have been 90,000. At any rate, there were more than 60,000 people there in 1864. The one town of Virginia City was estimated at that time to have twenty-five or thirty thousand people.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. How many are there now?

Mr. STEWART. In that town four or five thousand.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Is that a mining town?

Mr. STEWART. It is. Now, will the Senator from Indiana allow me to go on with some statements?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is very interesting.

Mr. STEWART. It would be more interesting if the Senator would allow me to go on.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very well.

Mr. STEWART. This was a mining population. People went there for mining purposes, and nobody but miners and stock raisers and a few people engaged in raising garden truck were occupied in any industrial pursuits in that country. The mines were silver mines, and the first prospecting in Nevada was for mines of the same character as the Comstock, containing what was known as free milling ores, and the State was pretty thoroughly prospected for free milling ores. They did not think of dealing with ores that had to be treated. Such ores could not then be so successfully worked as now because the processes of production had not been developed.

In this condition of the industries of Nevada silver was demonetized and the miners of that State were practically discouraged from prospecting for silver mines. The Comstock mines contain both gold and silver, as do other mines, but after the demonetization of silver, even the Comstock mines became less productive, and then thousands of miners, instead of going into Nevada to prospect, went into other countries. That made the population less.

Then we had another unfortunate condition of things in Nevada. The speculators in San Francisco who dealt in Nevada stocks found it to their interests to confine it to the Comstock, and they proclaimed in the newspapers and around the hotels that there was nothing in Nevada but the Comstock. Of course they made largely by it. It was one of the grandest trusts in a small way ever organized. They have collected for the last 25 years, an average, I suppose, of $500,000 a year from the laboring classes in the way of assessments. They have adopted all sorts of devices to lead them on. Those people have been paying assessments, and they do not want to give up their stock. All this gave Nevada a very black eye. It was said that there was nothing in Nevada but the Comstock. I seldom replied to it, although occasionally I did.

Finally, several years ago, men from the East, from Philadelphia and from other places, from Utah and from Colorado and from Montana, commenced to prospect in Montana, and they have found mines in almost every county in the State. The Tonopah mines constitute probably the greatest discovery made in the last ten years anywhere; and people are going there now. So great was the prejudice against Nevada, created by the Comstock dealers and the press interested in it (because they always published the Comstock assessment notices; the papers were full of them; it was a good thing for them, and they kept it up), that no California miner came over to prospect, and none of them are engaged in these new mines. They are so prejudiced that they would hardly go there now. They say there is nothing in Nevada but the Comstock.

Nevada has had to contend against that. I believe there is no State in the United States which can exceed Nevada in mineral wealth, in gold, silver, copper, lead, and iron, salt, soda, borax, nickel, and almost everything in the nature of mineral wealth. It is scattered over the State very generally, in almost every part of it, as is now being shown, and in the last two years there have undoubtedly been 8,000 or 10,000 added to the population and it is increasing. Everybody in Nevada feels jubilant over the renewed prosperity; but they have not got over their old prejudice in California. They believe there is nothing in Nevada but the Comstock. They will not believe anything else.

There is another thing about Nevada: It has in the mountains some of the most beautiful valleys that exist on earth, with streams of water coming down, with a most delightful climate, a most fertile soil. They are scattered all over the State. They raise the finest fruits of every kind. They raise the finest vegetables of every kind. It has been confined to stock raising. The people could not do anything else. There are a good many rich men there in the stock business. The hills furnish very nutritious grazing—bunch grass. If you have a fresh abundance of bunch grass it will fatten cattle quicker than anything else. Stockmen have always done well there. But agriculture has always been neglected, for the reason that there was no market, except you raised stock and drove them away. When they ceased prospecting for free-milling and free-smelting ores and silver went to nothing, mining was greatly embarrassed. That was the condition. It has entirely changed. It is a mistake to think that Nevada is not a State of great resources, and the time will come when you will be proud of the State of Nevada as a State of great wealth and great resources.

Let me say here that it will take a great deal of evidence to satisfy me that, with the introduction of railroads and the use of irrigation, a hundred and ten thousand miles can be carved out anywhere in the temperate zone that is useless and will not support a pretty large population. I recollect very well when everything west of the Missouri River was regarded on the maps as the Great American Desert. After General Sherman made the treaty with the Indians on the plains, when he gave them so much land deliberately, I had a conversation with him, and he said he did not care how much land he gave them. He said he would like to have given them all west of the Missouri River—in fact, all west of Minnesota. It was good for nothing, he said. Now we see these States springing up there, and they are States to be proud of. In fact, he said: "I should like to give this all back to Mexico. It is not worth taking care of." That was after the war, when it had been traveled over. We heard that there was nothing in this country.

Before the Pacific Railroad was built, and when the first law was passed, the question was discussed whether the country was good for anything. It was admitted that after you left the Missouri River it did not amount to anything, but it was claimed that it was important to bind the country together as a military proposition. It was said that the Western coast would secede and break off from this country, and that the railroad would bind them together; that the desert must be crossed; and then they wanted to know how much to charge for it.

They went to the Secretary of War to know what it cost to transport supplies for the Army, to take care of the Indians, etc., and to carry the mail across the continent. He reported eight millions a year. Then they figured that they would let it run thirty years, and that the Government service would more than liquidate the debt. That was the theory of it. It went two years. They could not proceed with it. They could not dispose of the bonds. So they reserved one-half of it, and they figured that would be enough in thirty years to liquidate the debt. The mail would be a bagatelle and the Indian business was done. They did not suppose the desert they were crossing would amount to anything. We now find there these great States. The Northern Pacific has been built, and it has developed a like line of great States in territory which was pronounced a barren waste; and the Southern Pacific has been built and it stopped the wars there. The Apache war used to cost about ten millions a year.

The road from Salt Lake to Los Angeles, in which the Senator from Montana [Mr. CLARK] takes such a prominent part, passes through southeastern Nevada where mines are abundant and agricultural lands extensive.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Nevada permit me?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. How much does the Senator think the railroads in Nevada are worth to-day on a fair valuation?

Mr. STEWART. Oh, I do not know.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. You certainly have some idea as to the valuation of the railroads that cross Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. I do not know that I have.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. How far is it across the State? The Southern Pacific crosses the State.

Mr. STEWART. Let me see. I suppose it is something over three or four hundred miles.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Three hundred miles. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] the other day gave data which is important just at this point. It was that the lowest estimate would be $30,000 a mile, and it was usually claimed these railroads cost perhaps $80,000 a mile. So you would have in Nevada an immense railroad property in valuation. What would you say is the taxable valuation of the railroad property, or the true valuation of the railroad property in Nevada?

Mr. STEWART. The railroad property is valued not according to the section or locality, but according to its length, its terminal facilities, and business. I would not be able to estimate the value of the property. That is not the only railroad we have. We have another railroad, 80 or 90 miles, to Eureka; another one to Austin, running south; then another, running from Reno about 150 or 200 miles down south. Then there is another from Reno running north, and more railroads will be built as more mines are opened, and things will be changed there as they have changed elsewhere.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Nevada early in the last session introduced an amendment to the Constitution providing that—

> The judicial power of the United States shall also extend to all controversies in law and equity relating to the use of water, except where the water and the use thereof are in the same State.

The Senator made a speech which called attention to what seemed to him to be possibly a very serious legal impediment to the successful irrigation on a large scale, at least as to interstate streams. That amendment has not been acted upon. But the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Kansas v. Colorado, on demurrer, rendered an opinion in which it leaves it very doubtful to what extent one State may utilize for irrigation purposes water flowing through that State into another State.

In that case it was claimed by Kansas that the irrigation laws and grants of Colorado have operated to very greatly diminish the flow of a river running from Colorado into Kansas. Remedy was sought by injunction. On demurrer the Supreme Court of the United States held, as the Senator from Nevada will remember, that the bill stated a case.

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. So that question, I want to say to my friend the Senator from North Dakota, has yet to be settled, and it is a very crucial question as to the availability of interstate rivers for irrigation purposes. It has become a very important factor.

Mr. STEWART. I am somewhat familiar with the history of water rights where irrigation and mining are concerned. The waters of the rivers of California were largely diverted in early times to work the placer mines. Persons owning lands in the beds of the streams contended that under the common law such diversion was illegal, and that they had a right to the full flow of the water over their land. The courts of California considered the question in all its bearings. They held that under the principle of the common law in a country like England, where there was an abundant rainfall for irrigation and where it was to the interest of all concerned that the water should continue to flow in the beds of the streams, that it was unlawful to divert it, because the interests of the country would be injured and not benefited by such diversion, but that in a mining and arid country like California it was absolutely necessary to divert the water for both mining and agricultural purposes; that the same principle which required the water to remain in the channels of streams in England, because it was its appropriate use, required its diversion in California where its appropriate use was for mining and agriculture on lands distant from the flowing waters. I still believe that a proper application of the common law should have reference to the conditions. When conditions are changed and a different use is required, the principles of the common law should conform to such changed conditions. I think the supreme court of California was wise in conforming its decision to the conditions of that country.

Mr. SPOONER rose.

Mr. STEWART. At the time I offered that proposed constitutional amendment read by the Senator from Wisconsin I knew of the controversy existing between Kansas and Colorado, and between several of the mountain States where interstate streams existed, and I foresaw long litigation and perhaps the destruction of a vast amount of property if the principle did not prevail, and that was the reason why I introduced the amendment.

I think the United States courts should be given jurisdiction of interstate water rights, and I think the courts should be sufficiently enlightened to apply the common law to the conditions which exist. Remember that the common law is but a system of principles, and changes and adapts itself to different circumstances and conditions; and if there is any similarity in the conditions for the use of water in a country like England, where they have abundant rainfall, and in an arid country, then I do not know it. The conditions are as different as day and night. A man who will apply the common law as to water rights to an arid country has not studied the principles underlying the law. What the Supreme Court may decide I do not know.

Then, again, there is great difficulty in getting parties before the court, so that it can determine the case. Here is the water right in one State. They have a large population which has grown up and thousands of people are engaged in their occupations. They use the water. The people in another State above it take the water away from them. They can not fairly go to that other State, because there are always objections there of local prejudice. They can not sue in their State, because the other parties do not live there.

The Congress has already taken action with regard to the use of water in the arid region. In 1866 nearly all the land west of the one hundredth meridian and east of the valley of California, except a few Mexican grants, belonged to the United States. When I was engaged in fighting the battle of the miners in Congress and contending for a recognition of their rights under the mining laws which they themselves had created, and when the property of more than a million American citizens was in jeopardy by a movement to confiscate the rights of the miners of the West by selling the mines at auction for the purpose of carrying on the war, the question of water rights incidentally arose. In 1851 Judge Field secured a provision in the California code to the effect that the rules and regulations established and enforced at the bar or diggings might be offered in evidence, and when not in conflict with the laws of the State or of the United States should govern the decision.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does it not go even further and include terms such as "veins appearing on the surface," "veins below the surface," not as interpreted by dictionaries, but as understood by mining usage and the common understanding of the miners? In other words, the whole mining law depends, as the Senator says, and even further than the Senator says, upon the common understanding among the miners as to what they mean.

Mr. STEWART. The common usage among the miners.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes.

Mr. STEWART. I presided over the convention that made the first rule as to what a "vein" meant. All we had were some small veins. We invented a way of describing them by declaring that a man might take so many feet along the vein or lode with all the dips, spurs, and angles, and based upon that the mining laws spread all over the country.

In 1866 there were a million and a half people who had their rights predicated upon the usages that sprung up in that way. We had a great fight over it in the Comstock. There is no need to go into those details. But Congress had something to do with these ditch rights in addition to what they did in regard to mining rights.

Mr. QUARLES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. QUARLES. If it will not interrupt the Senator from Nevada, I should like to ask him if in the preparation of his constitutional amendment he also had in mind a great variety of decisions in the different Western States independently of the interstate-river feature?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir.

Mr. QUARLES. I should like to ask the Senator, for no one is better qualified to answer than he, what probability there is of ever obtaining any harmony in system among these different States regarding the matter of water rights?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Without the Senator's constitutional amendment?

Mr. QUARLES. Without the Senator's constitutional amendment.

Mr. STEWART. I think it would be very embarrassing without the amendment.

Mr. QUARLES. Have not those rights accrued and those holdings been had with special reference to particular uses that each State had for the water?

Mr. STEWART. That is true.

The question of the right to divert water on the public lands was provided for in the act of 1866, which confirmed the rights of miners according to their local rulings established and enforced throughout the mining regions. After a lengthy debate the Senate decided that the rights of miners, which had grown up without legislation and had been molded into form by judicial decisions, should be respected. A bill passed the Senate for that purpose and went to the Committee on the Public Lands in the House. In the meantime Mr. Julian, of Indiana, who was chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, had been instructed by the House to bring in a bill to sell all the mines of the West at public auction to aid in the prosecution of the war. In order to advance the mining bill in the House, I suggested to Mr. Higby the propriety of urging the passage of a bill he then had in charge granting the right of way for canals and ditches over the public lands for mining and agricultural purposes. He accordingly called up the bill and it was passed. On my motion the Senate amended the bill of Mr. Higby by adding thereto the mining bill which had already passed the Senate. The title of Mr. Higby's bill was not changed, and that accounts for the peculiar title of the elaborate mining bill of 1866, which is "An act granting the right of way to ditch and canal owners over the public lands, and for other purposes." This law of Congress changed the rule in the Territories then existing with regard to the use of water. Instead of requiring the water to remain in the beds of the streams Congress expressly authorized its diversion. There can be no doubt that Congress had power to pass this act, because both the land and the water were then the property of the United States.

Since Congress authorized the diversion of the waters on the public lands for mining and agricultural purposes there has been no question among well-informed lawyers of the right to divert water in the arid region, nearly all of which was public land in 1866. The confusion which now exists arises from the different conditions in the East and in the West. In the West the water must be diverted in order to use it for irrigation and mining purposes or the country must be abandoned; in the East the principles governing the use of water in England are not altogether inapplicable. It is very evident where such conflicting conditions exist that there ought to be a common tribunal to harmonize the decisions. The common-law principle requiring the water to flow in the bed of the stream and not to be diverted is entirely inapplicable to the region where necessity requires its diversion. In other words, it is not applicable at all.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Nevada allow me?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will remember that in one very marked instance the courts of this country, holding the rule of the common law inapplicable to conditions in this country, held that the test was the test as to the navigability of streams. The rule in England was the ebb and flow of the tide.

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. But as we have internal rivers, hundreds of miles in extent, the courts held that that test was not applicable here. Otherwise the principal rivers of the country would have been nonnavigable, according to the common law. Our courts held that the test in this country, having regard to our physical conditions and necessities, is the fact of navigability.

Mr. STEWART. That is the principle underlying it. That is precisely analogous and precisely in point. Where people could not live with the water in the streams, they are not going to destroy the people for the sake of applying an inapplicable rule. The courts are not going to do it, and if we can get this thing properly understood throughout the United States (and it is now pretty well understood in the arid regions) it will be all right. The only trouble is that these States are a little jealous of each other, and they will not give them a fair show sometimes. I do not fancy that the people of Kansas would have a very fair show in Colorado fighting for water, and I do not suppose, if they had the suit in Kansas, Colorado would have a very good show.

Now, Colorado is differently situated from any other State in the arid region. It does not need that amendment, and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] was very much opposed to it, because no streams run into Colorado. They all run out of it. In it are the headwaters of thirty or forty streams running in every direction, and they want to keep the water up in that country and to disregard what is done with streams after they utilize them, which is unfair. That is the situation in Colorado. There is not any other State so situated. In Colorado the water runs out of it in every direction, and consequently they would like to have the privilege, after population is settled in another State, of drying up the water there and cultivating some more land in their State, on the theory that there is not enough water in Colorado.

Now, as to the quantity of water, we have heard a good deal said about the quantity necessary to make a country prosperous. Few people can realize how irrigation grows—how the fact of irrigation creates more land. I think there is no prettier illustration of that than in northern Utah. There are four or five cities along upon the road which goes up to Montana. I was on that road some forty years ago, before there was any railroad and before there was much population. They were called cities then, and they would have probably two or three thousand inhabitants in them. There would be from half a section to a section of land cultivated and all the water was used. We thought that was the limit. Now, if you go up there you will find large cities, and the whole country from one city to another is fertile and cultivated. When water is put upon the land it becomes absorbed. At first the land becomes compact and moist and you cover it with vegetation, and then it takes very little water, and as time goes on its fertility increases immensely.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And another element, it takes some time for the water to soak, and then also evaporation has been going on in the meantime. It takes some time also, for the atmosphere is at work, to become impregnated with moisture, and that stops the evaporation, just as the soaking of the soil stops the waste of water there. So the saturation of the atmosphere is also another element.

Mr. STEWART. To some extent. By covering it with vegetation, with a little stream of water you can make a home for people. That is the case in Nevada, where there are little valleys all over the State. There are hundreds and perhaps thousands of them. There will be a little stream of water and they have stock raising there, and that is about all they can do now because they have no market. But in those little valleys as the population increases and as the local market increases the land will be utilized. There will in time be a large area of Nevada in the very highest state of cultivation.

The products of an arid country like Nevada are very superior. The potatoes grown there take the first prize at every fair wherever they go, because the people understand irrigation and they irrigate exactly at the right time. Then there is a good deal of alkali in the water, and the potatoes are just like those raised in a piece of ground which has just been been cleaned off. In that way the fruit is fine, and Nevada is capable of sustaining a large population, although it will take some time. It is increasing now very rapidly.

I have stood here a long time and I have heard Nevada used as an illustration. I think it is unfair. Nevada did not ask to come in. It was brought in. Nevada has taken care of herself. She has carried on her government, and has had good government, and the people are satisfied, and they are now full of hope. They will feel very much chagrined and hurt to have their resources disparaged after so much has occurred, for the press of California has been saying that there is nothing in Nevada after the Comstock, and that has injured Nevada very much. But people are coming in from every State in the Union and adding to the population, and helping to develop the resources of the State. The Nevadians feel proud of their State, and I tell you Nevada is not going to be any detriment to the United States. The Comstock alone has produced $600,000,000 of gold and silver, nearly half gold, and the silver was mostly produced when it was as good as gold.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course, it would have produced that if it had been a Territory.

Mr. STEWART. I do not know—not so easily; not so well. When it was a Territory they labored under the condition of a bad judiciary.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is a condition which was undoubtedly true at that time; but everyone who has spoken upon this question has admitted that the former condition, a bad judiciary, owing to the appointment of broken-down politicians, has passed away.

Mr. STEWART. We have not had a scandal about judges in the State since she became a State.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Did I understand the Senator to say that he had the whole judiciary to resign at one time?

Mr. STEWART. They did resign.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is a piece of information which is, of course, very interesting, but it does not occur to me——

Mr. HALE. What became of those judges?

Mr. STEWART. I think they are pretty much all dead now.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I ask the Senator why he had them resign?

Mr. STEWART. Unpleasant affidavits were in existence.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The nature of the judiciary in the Territory has been referred to here three or four times and we have contended that that bad condition has passed away.

Mr. STEWART. It never will pass away.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada one question. What assurance will we have, as long as the Territorial condition is maintained, that it will not recur again at some future time?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit me to answer the question?

Mr. McCUMBER. We can not certainly guarantee a Territory against its return.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will answer the Senator's question in a little while. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. HALE. In other words, the suggestion of the Senator is that one reason for admitting a Territory as a State is that as a Territory it will continue with corrupt judges?

Mr. STEWART. Let me answer that. I undertake to say that the officers sent into a Territory are not as a rule as good as those the people would elect, from judges down. There has been scandal in all the Territories while they were Territories. There have been very serious ones in Idaho and in nearly all of them. I believe Washington is the only Territory which was comparatively free from scandal, but to my knowledge it comes from all the Territories all the time, more or less.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. We never had any scandal in North Dakota.

Mr. STEWART. You did not remain a Territory long enough.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Too many people came there.

Mr. STEWART. You did not have to depend on mining and irrigation at the start. It was simply an agricultural country.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. There were no great law cases at stake in that Territory.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It was a fertile country, and so many people came in there.

Mr. STEWART. We have a larger population in our towns, I think, than there is in the towns of North Dakota.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. You have a larger population in Nevada than in North Dakota?

Mr. STEWART. I said we have larger towns than they have in North Dakota.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Not a larger population?

Mr. STEWART. Not in the whole State.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. We had a very small population in the Dakotas until they came into the Union as States.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. They had from 500,000 to 700,000 in the Dakotas put together.

Mr. STEWART. In North Dakota?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. In the Dakotas put together they had something like 700,000 before they came in as States. In South Dakota they had between 350,000 and 400,000. If I am wrong the Senator from North Dakota will correct me.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. How many did you have? I have the figures down stairs.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Something like 35,000 or 40,000 in North Dakota prior to statehood.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. At the time of admission?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. We had more than that. I do not remember the figures exactly, but we had not anything near 700,000.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator mean to say that the time North Dakota was admitted to the Union——

Mr. HANSBROUGH. We had a small number at that time.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I have the figures here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is impossible for the Reporters to correctly take down the proceedings when Senators do not address the Chair.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will merely say——

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I understand that the Senator from Wisconsin has the figures.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What Senator has the floor?

Mr. STEWART. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. I addressed the Chair. Both South Dakota and North Dakota were admitted November 2, 1889, and it is stated here that they together had a population of 500,000—South Dakota 328,808 and North Dakota 182,719.

Mr. STEWART. It is perfectly obvious that in an agricultural country like the Dakotas, where they were both rich States, the conditions would not be like those in a mining country, where millions might be involved in one suit.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will state to the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I intended to say 140,000, instead of 40,000.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from North Dakota now says it was 140,000. So there is no dispute between the Senator and myself.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It was my intention to say 140,000 instead of 40,000.

Mr. STEWART. It is entirely immaterial——

Mr. DEPEW. May I ask the Senator from Nevada a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. STEWART. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. DEPEW. I have not heard the whole discussion, but when I came in I judged that the contention was that statehood necessarily led to an increase in population. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada if that has been the result in Nevada?

Mr. STEWART. That is another lick at Nevada. I expected it. If the Senator had been here I would have shown him what happened in Nevada. It was the California press who had the publication of assessment notices and wanted to make it appear that there was nothing in Nevada but the Comstock. They published it, and your papers published it here in the East, and that went on for some years. You demonetized silver, and that destroyed our principal industry. We will not stop to discuss any of those questions. That great population went away, and it was some time before we could commence to regain the population. But now people are coming into Nevada from every State in the Union. Nevada has much better prospects than it ever had before in its history. Nevada has agricultural lands enough, when they are utilized, to support a very large population—more than the population contained in many States whose Representatives are now here objecting to the admission of new States.

There is no trouble about Nevada. Nevada has taken care of herself. It has been no detriment to the United States. It has helped very much in carrying on the commerce of the country.

I recollect how differently I was received when I first came here. I met Mr. Lincoln. He took me by the hand and said, "I am glad to meet you. I have taken great interest in your country." He said, "It was the output of gold and silver from your country which has given the country credit and enabled us to carry on the war. I hail you; I am glad to meet you;" and he took me by both hands. He spoke in encouraging terms.

That was the feeling when Nevada came in. You invited us. We did not come of our own accord. We were then contributing largely to the wealth of the country. The Comstock lode contributed, as I remarked, $600,000,000; the Eureka $150,000,000, and the other camps have produced smaller amounts, but they have produced a great deal. Nearly a thousand million dollars have been produced in Nevada. It has gone into commerce and helped to sustain the credit of the country. You contributed nothing to us. No appropriations have been made for Nevada. It has been no drag upon the country. But because circumstances prevented its natural and legitimate growth for a term of years, people sneer at Nevada. I tell you the people are mistaken who attempt to make it appear that there are 110,000 square miles of land anywhere in the United States in the Temperate Zone not capable of supporting a population sufficient to make a State equal to a large number of States in the Union. You underrate it. There has been too much said in disparagement of our Western country.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, if he had heard what was said about Nevada before he came in the Chamber I am quite certain he would not have felt called upon to defend Nevada against any imputation which has been made here to-day. I would not for the world make any utterance here which would reflect upon Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. I know the Senator from Wisconsin would not.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And I did not.

Mr. SPOONER. Nor did the Senator from Indiana call attention to Nevada. No one can dispute that mere statehood without regard to area does not necessarily increase population.

Mr. STEWART. But it increases good government.

Mr. SPOONER. Undoubtedly that is true. One evidence of that is that they had the wisdom to send the Senator here as a Senator with his colleague and to keep them here. That has been a valuable contribution by Nevada to the good of the country generally.

Mr. STEWART. I do not know about that.

Mr. SPOONER. I thought sometimes, not always, but generally. However, I merely rose to say that if the Senator labored under the impression at all that Nevada had been attacked——

Mr. STEWART. Not at all.

Mr. SPOONER. Or that Nevada had been depreciated in any way here, he is mistaken.

Mr. STEWART. I rose to repudiate the idea that Nevada is an argument against the admission of other new States. The admission of Nevada was a good thing. Nevada has contributed her full share, according to population, and vastly more, to the general prosperity of the country, and she has cost the Government nothing. No national expenditure has been made in Nevada. She has got no rivers and harbors to improve. No appropriations have been made for Nevada of any account whatever.

Before most of the Territories became States they had their Territorial buildings erected. There were none built for Nevada. It is true that the Government has erected one public building in Nevada since then, and a bill has been passed to erect another public building in Nevada at a cost of $60,000; but Nevada has not been a drag. She has been paying money into the Treasury of the Government and receiving nothing from it particularly. She has a good government, and she has gotten it at home. She got the resources after her admission to make an important State, and she has a good country as soon as she gets a market, and people will be delighted to go into those valleys in time. But there is no market now. Her products are not needed in California. It is like carrying coals to Newcastle. It is too far to transport them East. But the time will come when those valleys will be needed, when they will have a market at home, and when the mineral resources will be developed; and Nevada will be a State with a fine population in time.

As to the Territories that you now so much despise you will be astonished in a few years at the position they will occupy. Take Arizona, for example. There will be a much larger population there some day than they have now. There are ruins everywhere there showing where people had lived in a former age of the world, and when the waters of Arizona are utilized and when the mines are further developed it is going to be a prosperous and a great State. Arizona is capable of maintaining a large population. New Mexico has her resources comparatively untouched. Enterprise is just going in there, and in a short time you will see a very great change in New Mexico. These will be good States, and you will be proud of them, and it would be better to get them out of a Territorial condition. It would be better to have the people satisfied. People are never satisfied in a Territorial condition. They want to elect their own officers.

Mr. President, I did not intend to make this talk. But I say that citizens of the United States are entitled to elect their own officers as soon as practicable. It is for their good and the good of the whole country.

Mr. QUARLES. Before the Senator from Nevada takes his seat I would be very much gratified, indeed, if he would give the Senate a little information on a practical question. In figuring the resources of the States where irrigation has obtained a very great variety of views seem to be entertained as to the amount of irrigable land that ought to be taken up by the head of a family. For instance, under the general irrigation act which we passed at the last session it is left entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior as to how much land the head of a family shall be permitted to take, and there has been quite a discussion among those who are not familiar with this subject as to the land under all the circumstances the head of a family ought to be permitted to take.

Mr. STEWART. Of irrigable land a very small amount. I have not the time to discuss it now, but I would advocate small farms of irrigable land.

Mr. QUARLES. What does the Senator call a small farm?

Mr. STEWART. From 100 to 160 acres; or 40 acres perhaps would be better.

Mr. HALE. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. STEWART. I say 160 acres is a large farm, and 100 acres is a large farm to be cultivated by irrigation.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And even smaller.

Mr. STEWART. Forty acres is better, but the farmer might need grazing land in the mountains.

Mr. QUARLES. Would not 20 acres be enough?

Mr. STEWART. Brigham Young fixed it at 20 acres when he went into Utah, and they did splendidly with 20 acres, but perhaps 40 acres would be better than 20.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is on the theory of intensive cultivation?

Mr. STEWART. Irrigation is intensive cultivation.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is partly intensive.

Mr. STEWART. It is intensive. If you irrigate properly and cultivate the land to make it profitable, it must be done intensively.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] entered the Chamber while the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] and myself were engaged in a colloquy. I had interrupted the Senator from North Dakota to ask him a question. He was making some observations. I do not know whether he is through now or not.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If he is, I will go on. The first thing I will state for the benefit of the Senator from Nevada, who did not hear the opening remarks of this colloquy in which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] and myself and the Senator from North Dakota engaged, is that there was no reflection whatever upon Nevada and its people. The Senator from Wisconsin has said that no such reflection came from him, and I say that no such reflection has come from me.

Mr. SPOONER. I added that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; you did add it. I further say that I know many of the people of Nevada. I have very great friendship, individual friendship, for many of them, and a great affection for many of them; and I think very highly of them as a mass, I will say to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator say that he knows almost all the people of Nevada?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; though it would not be a great tax on my memory. No reflection was made whatever. I believe it is prohibited by the rules of the Senate to reflect upon another State in any event.

I will say for the benefit of the Senator from Nevada that the Senator from North Dakota perhaps misapprehended the remarks, because when the Senator from Nevada entered, the Senator from North Dakota, who was standing on his feet with myself, said to the Senator from Nevada that statements had been made concerning Nevada unfavorable to her, and the Senator from Nevada, of course very naturally and properly, came to the defense of his State—something that no Senator is to be blamed for doing.

But I will state for the benefit of the Senator from Nevada that the thing came about in this way: I interrupted the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM] in the course of his able address upon the subject of the increase of irrigation in Arizona, and became engaged in a colloquy with one of the Senators here upon the possibility, which I think is very probable at some future time, of the increase of that irrigation and the increase of the population accordingly. But it was said in case that should fail (and it is a speculative matter, as the testimony shows) and the State was already admitted, we would then find a condition where the things we had expected to occur did not occur, and that instead of having an increasing population, if irrigation did not prove a success in a large measure we would have necessarily a decreasing population, for the reason that the chief industry was mining, and unless irrigation could be increased the chief industry must continue to be mining, and that as soon as the mines were exhausted the population would decrease in exact proportion to the exhaustion of the mines.

Some reference was then made to the decrease of the population of Nevada, and the statement was made as a necessary sequence that the mere fact of statehood had not made an increase in the population of Nevada; that natural conditions must exist; that merely because you throw over land where no people can live the name of a State, people are not going to move where they can not live in comfort. So that was the reason why Nevada came into the discussion at all.

On the contrary, I think the Senator will find if he looks at the RECORD that very complimentary mention, indeed, was made of the beautiful valleys of Nevada. I have been in that State and I have been through that State. Of course, no person is going to paint in words of fancy any particular productivity of the desert land of that State. All that the Senators from that State want, all that we want, all that anybody wants, is the mere truth to be told about it.

Nevada is very beautiful in many of its parts, in certain spots very productive, and no person could wish more than I myself that all the dreams in which the Senator who has just quit the floor has indulged shall come true. I think that the Senator's amendment is a very wise provision. I thought so when he introduced it. I am not able to see how the serious consequences which the Senator sees from a conflict of State laws on the question of water are going to be harmonized without his amendment. I think it is a very wise measure, and I expect, unless I change my mind by reason of further thought and larger information, to support it when it shall come before the Senate.

But, Mr. President, this question has arisen, and it arose, I believe, out of the first statement of the Senator from North Dakota, who rose when I was making a remark with reference to a statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire that the people of the West are a very hopeful people. The Senator is not more of the West than I am myself. I, also, am of the West. That splendid people came in a larger measure and by a greater percentage from Indiana than any other State in the Union. They are blood of my blood and bone of my bone and flesh of my flesh. I do not permit the Senator from North Dakota to profess a greater affection for and belief in them and their good qualities than I myself entertain. But, Mr. President, I ask the Senator whether or not he proposes to build a State on hope. Had we not better build it on facts? Hope is not certainty. Hope may fail. But when your act as to the matter now pending here is done, it will be permanent; but your hope may not vitalize into a fact.

The Senator went on to say that they were very hopeful that irrigation would reclaim vast tracts of land out there. So am I. But the Senator admitted that it was a question for the future. Why, then, shall we not await the certainty of events upon that question before we determine an act which, when done, is done forever; for when a State is admitted it is admitted forever?

Mr. President, do we say, as might be inferred from what the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] stated, that even if admitted the people will not be worthy? Not at all. There have been some such words used in the course of this debate as "libel" and "misrepresentation" of people. I submit that is a misrepresentation of the committee's position. We have stated in our report, in more earnest language than has been used upon the floor of the Senate in debate, the excellent qualities of many of the people of Arizona and New Mexico. We have stated, too, all of the hopeful conditions of the future. The point made is that, in justice to the rest of the nation and to the maintenance of the vital principle of a democratic form of government, a rule of the people and not a rule of an area, the government by the people and not a government by square miles shall be preserved in the United States.

We do not mean to say that those people would not elect good officers, and all that, but we mean to say merely that their numbers are too few and their condition not yet sufficiently developed to justify them in a reasonable proportion with the rest of the people of the country in coming in and having equal voting power with the great State of Pennsylvania. Probably the town of Scranton—the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] can tell me how much population it has—but I think certainly the city of Allegheny has a greater population than all this vast Territory of Arizona. Does the Senator think it is exactly fair to the rest of the nation that that meager population, however excellent, shall have equal power in determining all the policies of this great Republic for all time to come with the State of Pennsylvania? Is it to be argued from that, Mr. President, that we contend that it will have to be equal to the State of Pennsylvania before being admitted? Not at all. We contend merely that it shall bear some fair proportion to the population of the rest of the Republic.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] was wrong about his figures. Perhaps I was a little wrong, too, but I was much more nearly right than he. The two States of North and South Dakota, when they were admitted, had a population of something over 500,000. It is not the case that Nevada had more people when admitted than North Dakota had. North and South Dakota were admitted in 1889, and by the census of the following year the population of South Dakota was 328,808, and the population of North Dakota was 182,719; and I remember, in reading the debates concerning them, that claims were made for them up to the limit of 700,000 people.

So that when the Senator from North Dakota draws any possible comparison between his State and these Territories, he does not draw a comparison but a contrast; and what is the contrast? The contrast is the contrast of human conditions—broad and fertile plains and prairies, streams, water courses, and even lakes—which do not exist in these Territories—making the land fertile, making farms profitable, making an inviting empire upon which a great and enterprising people can build their homes.

I do not say they are better than the people of Arizona—not at all—but merely that there has not yet developed in Arizona conditions that make them equal with the conditions in North Dakota. I wish they were. It would give me as great possible pleasure as it would the Senator from North Dakota to advocate their admission if they were. But the question is, had we not better, having in mind what we owe to this Republic, wait until we find out whether these poems of the Senator's imagination shall prove facts before we do an act which is irrevocable, which we can not undo?

Is that not the course of wisdom? If, as I say, suppose the hope should fail—and the testimony before the committee shows that the scientists in the employ of the Government, who are studying this question upon the ground, think that it is a problematical matter, and, even if a certainly, certainly a question of years—had we not better wait until we see whether there are conditions for a larger population?

I will vote for any measure on this floor that will insure a larger population to those Territories by increasing and improving the physical conditions. I am willing to put to the test who is the best friend of the people of those Territories—those who want them admitted so that the 4 per cent limitation of indebtedness, which now preserves them from certain men may be removed, or those who are willing to vote for special measures which shall put water in their streams, if it can be had, and store up waters, if they can be found, and spread them over the lands in their deserts and make them blossom like the rose.

(At this point Mr. BEVERIDGE yielded the floor, and the Senate soon afterwards proceeded to the consideration of executive business.)

Friday, January 23, 1903.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, I believe at the conclusion of my remarks yesterday I was about to speak of the conditions in Phoenix and elsewhere in Arizona with reference to the water supply. Phoenix, as we all understand, is the garden spot of that Territory, and in that city and vicinity we find in the highest degree the development of irrigation; it has been developed there more than in any other place. Phoenix is a city of enterprise, activity, and capital; and undoubtedly the citizens have done all they can possibly do in promoting their own interests and in furnishing a supply of water to the city.

I find from the testimony of one who is certainly able to give correct information, Mr. Newell, of the Geological Survey, that for two or three years past the condition in that city has been extremely serious, and that during that time not over half or two-thirds of the land normally cultivable or that had been in a state of cultivation could be used because of lack of water.

It seems to me that if in that city, with its conditions and favorable circumstances, by reason of the want of water supply, there has been a failure to such a large extent it is a matter to attract our attention and excite our earnest inquiry whether there is not danger of a still greater loss from the same want of supply not only in Phoenix but elsewhere throughout Arizona.

We find it to be the fact, as stated by Mr. Fowler, who kindly assisted us about the city of Phoenix, that his own orchard and other orchards have been destroyed because of the want of water. He spoke of his orange groves and his vineyards, and said that some of these had been lost because of this want. This statement was confirmed by the evidence before us during our visit in and about that city.

It was said yesterday in debate that there were in Nevada little streams, living, active streams of water, that were flowing down the hills and mountains of that State and through the valleys, and that along the banks of those streams there was a successful cultivation of land, and a remarkable thrift and prosperity. But I want to say that during our visit in these Territories we found no such little streams of water. They would have been gratifying to our eyes, after our long journeys over the desert waste, but instead we generally found what had apparently been the beds of living water. There was evidence that in the past water had been flowing over these beds; but during our visit nothing was visible except the sand, dry as either shore, dry as the desert through which we passed.

We find in connection with Salt River, which furnishes the water of the city of Phoenix, a statement made by Mr. Trott, one of the water commissioners of that city. In his annual report to the Governor of the Territory he stated that during certain years—1895, 1896, 1897, and 1898—he had made tests to ascertain the water supply of that river, one of the great irrigation rivers of Arizona. He found subsequently, in making the same tests in the years 1899, 1900, 1901, and 1902, and contrasting them with the four prior years, that there had been a diminution of the water supply passing through the river to the enormous amount of 70 per cent. Two-thirds and more of that water supply had failed during the later four years. If this is true, it seems to me it has an important bearing upon present conditions and future prospects in this Territory.

It has been said that in New Mexico there were living in times past three or four hundred thousand people. If so, then from all the evidence which has come before us by way of testimony and from all that has appeared in our investigation, it must have been true that in years gone by—the distant years—there were great supplies of water there which do not exist to-day.

It seems that the rainfall, as I understand from the records, has been diminishing. Of course it may be possible that these are transient years, that it will be only two, three, or four years before conditions will change; but is that certain? Is it not quite as reasonable to assume that these years will continue on with a diminishing supply of water?

We want to submit this as a proposition: We are to give statehood where the qualifications for statehood exist to-day; but surely if we are looking forward to other qualifications, if we are to consider possibilities, we must take into account the only basis there possibly is for increased population there to any extent, and that is the supply of water, irrigation, and the storage of those torrents that are said at certain seasons of the year to come down through the passes and overflow the banks of streams and rivers. I think the conditions at Phoenix have been made evident.

There are in the arid region, it is said, streams that start in the mountains, although we did not see them, or start somewhere, but it is a fact that before they reach the main river, during most of the year, or at least during the summer months, they pass out of existence. They fail to reach the river. It seems that the porous soil absorbs these meager streams when the summer months come on.

The Rio Grande in New Mexico—their greatest river—excited in my mind quite a little anticipation. I thought it was a grand river, and that I would see an immense amount of water flowing along. But it seems that the Rio Grande above Albuquerque, not much more, I think, than one-third of the way down the Territory of New Mexico, during many months of the year disappears, and instead of being a living stream of large extent, flowing with great waters, is dead and turned to dust. There is nothing that you could discover of water pools or places where fish could live, as suggested by a witness in an affidavit, or anything else except the dry, barren sands, just as we found at El Paso, where it was simply a highway for the passing traveler.

The only recourse, as has been said by witnesses over and over again, acknowledged and without question, is to store the flood waters, the torrential waters, that come down from the mountains during certain seasons of the year. Mr. Newell, in his testimony, states that it is possible to construct reservoirs; he thinks they will be built within the next century or generation; but no one system has yet been determined upon as feasible.

In this connection, and upon the question of the possibility or the practicability of storage, I call attention to the rainfall conditions. I call attention to the uncertain flow of these streams, and to the fact that in some instances, at least in the case of the Salt River, where tests have been made, the water supply is diminishing from year to year. In 1900 it was much more than in 1901, and in 1902 it was much less than it was in 1901.

In a letter written by Mr. Newell to the chairman of our committee, dated December 6, 1902, the ineffectiveness of such rainfall as occurs in New Mexico and Arizona is plainly set forth. It seems so important that I desire to read it:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY,
Washington, D. C., December 6, 1902.

HON. ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your inquiry regarding the rainfall in arid and semiarid regions and the effect of this in the formation of rivers, I should first explain that the data concerning the amount and time of the occurrence of rain are collected by the Weather Bureau and are obtained from their publications. The study of these figures in connection with those of the flow of various streams has brought out several facts of interest, particularly that the quantity of water available for storage and for irrigation is not directly dependent upon the quantity of rain which falls during the year. The slope of the ground and the rate at which the rain falls each have often a very large influence on the behavior of the rivers.

To illustrate this two extreme cases may be taken: In the first, a rain falling upon a nearly level surface, such as the plains of western Kansas or the "Panhandle" of Texas, may be entirely soaked into the ground or stand in pools on the surface and be completely evaporated; thus over hundreds of square miles there are no water courses, the prairie sod being too tough to permit young streams to be formed. Here is a region of moderate rainfall from which there is no run-off. On the other extreme, take a high granite peak. The rains falling upon this at once flow down the smooth sides and a very trifling amount is evaporated or absorbed by the rocks, practically all of the rainfall being available for water storage.

As an example of the way in which rain falls, on one extreme we can take the gentle, long-continued shower, in which several inches of rain falls, but descends at about the rate at which the earth can receive it, and thus upon even the rolling hills all of the water goes into the ground, to be subsequently evaporated or transmitted to springs at a lower altitude.

The same amount of rain falling on the same region in a sudden cloudburst or heavy downpour does not have time to soak into the ground, and hence a flood occurs from a rainfall of the same quantity as that above noted, and which does not appreciably swell the streams.

It is characteristic of arid regions that the rain which falls is usually torrential. For months, or even years, there may be scarcely appreciable precipitation, and then comes a sharp shower of 2 or 3 inches of rain. The dry soil is deluged so quickly that the surface is packed and little of the rain sinks in, the greater part instantly flowing off into stream channels and coming down as a destructive flood, valueless for irrigation and dangerous to curb in the ordinary storage reservoir.

A statement of annual rainfall does not bring out this fact of the erratic distribution of rain in the arid regions, of which, say, 10 inches may fall during the year. The greater part may be in one or two showers at short intervals and cause temporary floods. This renders it essential to guard carefully against conclusions drawn from a simple statement of the total annual rainfall in any locality, particularly if this has to do with the probable amount of water available for use. There are regions which have the same annual rainfall, one of which has no streams, and the ground is covered with valuable nutritious grasses; the other is a nearly barren desert, intersected with stream channels, the size of whose bowlders indicate that at long intervals powerful floods plow their way through the desolate waste.

Very truly, yours,

F. H. NEWELL, Hydrographer.

This is the statement of Mr. Newell as it appears in the report of the committee.

There is another fact which appears in the testimony of Mr. Newell on pages 184 and 185:

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Newell, concerning the rainfalls on the plains, what becomes of those rainfalls on the plains?

Mr. NEWELL. A considerable portion of the rain sinks into the ground; another part evaporates, and another small amount runs away, forming streams if there are channels through which it can readily escape.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not a fact that within an hour after these rains fall on the plains the plains are as dry and dusty as before?

Mr. NEWELL. Frequently; quite dry.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator PATTERSON asked you concerning fodder raised without irrigation, to which you responded that that was somewhat true. I want to ask you if that is not true along the streams only.

Mr. NEWELL. As I understood the question it was as to whether the fodder raised without irrigation was not valuable. It is extremely valuable.

The CHAIRMAN. But where it is raised without irrigation it is along streams?

Mr. NEWELL. Usually it is along lands which are subirrigated or wet by natural sources. * * *

The CHAIRMAN. So that apart from the scarcity of water in the streams about which we have spoken, how far away from the streams, if there was enough water, could irrigation be carried on by canals?

Mr. NEWELL. It depends wholly upon the topography of the country. As a rule the irrigation ditches rarely depart more than a few miles from the stream. There are cases in Kansas where they can go off at right angles to the stream.

If this information is correct, and it is given by one whose expert knowledge must be conceded, then after all, after storage, after the streams are supplied with water, how far distant can the canals carry that water? The answer, in substance, is, "rarely more than a few miles unless the topography is peculiarly favorable."

There are no conditions here, I submit, such as exist in Kansas, where canals go off at right angles to the stream. At all events, the statement stands for our information, and I believe that there are good reasons for stating that there may be serious difficulty in the future so far as water supply is concerned in that Territory. Our belief arises in part from the fact that this scheme of irrigation has its limits, and generally can not be carried beyond a few miles from the streams. If so, then looking over the map of the Territories you will find perhaps four or five irrigating streams; a few miles away from the banks the limits of irrigation would generally be reached.

Now, I wish to call attention to the great expense of constructing reservoirs. It has appeared, I think, in the report of the Governor of Arizona that the cost of construction is an important factor and must be in proportion to the value of the water supply. It is evident that you can not build dams which are to withstand torrential floods unless they are anchored pretty firmly to either bank, and they must be built with extreme care, with solid foundations, and with the expenditure of a large amount of money.

If I remember correctly, gentlemen from Maricopa County, Ariz., were before our committee last session and were asking of that committee—what? That we should allow them the privilege of exceeding their tax rate of 4 per cent for the purpose of building a dam upon this same Salt River, away up the stream some distance. The object, as I understood it and recall it now, was to build a dam at an expense of perhaps $2,000,000 or something more.

So, I submit, such enterprises are beyond the capacity, beyond the means certainly, of individuals, and beyond the means of ordinary corporations. I understand it is a fact that corporations which were organized in California built dams and attempted to supply water under a system of irrigation, but the result was unfortunate, and some of them failed in their enterprise. I think that it is true of one of the early railroad and irrigation companies in the Pecos Valley that it did not receive for its large expenditure of money a sufficient income and was obliged to abandon its undertaking.

It is, I submit, a question of time, and of a considerable length of time. It can be done only by the Government; and if so, it is not a project that can be accomplished next year or in the near future. It means years to come, as I believe, because, in the first place, the sites must be selected with great care, with the best of engineering skill, and when they are located the building of dams, as we all know, in governmental construction takes long periods of time.

It is true that in some places there has been a storage of water; but I understand the system that is most feasible has not yet been ascertained, and certainly no government will build dams and start out upon such enterprises until the best system has been clearly determined upon.

There is, as everyone knows, when water is impounded, a considerable per cent of loss. The reservoir must cover acres and acres of land. It may or may not be deep, but it certainly must contain a vast volume of water if it is at some time to supply the acres that lie below. During the process of time not only that body of water, but the canal, the laterals, the ditches supplied with water, are subject to the hot winds and burning suns of that arid region, and I submit that the question of evaporation is certainly one of great consequence.

Then, too, there is another loss which must be taken into account. There is a loss if the nature of the soil is, as has been stated, porous—so much so that wells are often impracticable. If it is so porous that wells can not supply more than a few feet of land without storage, surely when you come to carry water for miles, or for any considerable distance, it would percolate through and into the soil, and there would be an immeasurable loss. So it is right to say that the best and most feasible scheme of irrigation has not yet been devised.

In this connection I should like to call attention to a map from the Geological Survey, not prepared with reference to this controversy. There was no statehood interest in the planning or drafting of this map; but it is, I understand, one of a series. It is so marked here, No. 10, from the Geological Survey, Division of Hydrography. I wish to call attention to it specifically. From the statement here, as I read it, the black areas represent land taken up, capable of sustaining population, and the white areas represent land open to entry, but not capable of supporting population. This is the picture of Arizona [exhibiting]. This map tells you what is capable of sustaining population, according to the scientific statement from a Department of our Government. I submit it is proof or ocular evidence of all that has been accomplished during the centuries of Mexican occupation and during the thirty-nine years of Territorial government, and that it is a striking commentary upon the enterprise of the people, upon their means, or upon conditions which, I submit, are in a large degree insurmountable obstacles.

I understand that the black areas represent land taken up or capable of sustaining population. Note how insignificant and limited and circumscribed those areas are. Those black limits [indicating] tell us where population is or can be, and the white areas tell us where it can not be. It is possible that there are through the mountains forage districts where to some extent in a small way agriculture is carried on, where cereals are raised, not to complete natural growth, but simply as forage, cut when they are green, and where potatoes to some extent are grown. But I submit that this map, coming from the source it does, is entitled to credit, and it certainly gives us an understanding of what the conditions were at the time that survey was made, a year or two since.

There is a possibility, it is said, that we may obtain irrigation through wells, but we meet a difficulty which it seems to me is apparent, and which was stated in evidence, that, in the first place, there must be a series of wells. No single well answers the purpose. There must be a series of wells that will fill some reservoir, and that reservoir must be of some extent. It must be built at considerable expense, and for the purpose of flooding a given territory at once, before the water can enter into the soil near by, before it can percolate through and thus deprive the main territory of its supply.

If this be true, then the people who are undertaking to supply water on their farms from wells will be involved in an expense that is far beyond their means. I do not believe that ordinary corporations can do that work to any considerable extent. Moreover, there is the expense of power. There is the expense of steam, which is no inconsiderable sum, or else the uncertain winds must be relied upon; and I do not believe they can be relied upon even in that country, where they are perhaps more general than elsewhere.

In relation to this matter there is a single fact to which I should like to call attention. Mr. Newell was asked concerning the same Salt River we have been speaking of in reference to Phoenix. The question put to him was:

Is there any other source of water supply for irrigation except that water from the river?

Mr. NEWELL. That is the only source excepting a small amount of water to be obtained from deep or artesian wells and from shallow wells in the gravels near the river channel.

The CHAIRMAN. Could any appreciable quantity of water be obtained in that way, taking into consideration the whole area?

And the answer, to which I call attention, is as follows:

Mr. NEWELL. That would probably not represent more than 1, 2, or 3 per cent of the entire area that is irrigable. (P. 177.)

So that through wells you could supply only this very small per cent—1, 2, or 3 per cent of the irrigable area.

Attention has been called to this matter because of its grave importance, and because of what has been suggested already, that the question would be different if the population were sure to develop and increase to a large extent in the near future. In the Northwest Territory it was known as an assured fact that when the lands were opened to settlement there would be a large development, that people would come from over the country, from the East, from the Atlantic States, and fill those most desirable lands where there was water, where there was timber, where there was everything that could be inviting in a new settlement. But here every visitor meets, in the first place, with the awful fact of the absence of rain.

We come now to another industry, and that is stock raising. Their agricultural interest is as I have stated; their stock raising is another industry. But here there is the same difficulty. We find that cattle raising can be carried on only within limited areas; only within 5 miles from streams or holes where water can be found. The limited supply from streams or pools in that Territory is a great hindrance to cattle raising, which can not be removed until a successful system of water storage has been established.

MINING.

Another industry is mining, to which attention has already been called. It is prosperous in some localities, but not in all. When a mine has been opened and success has attended the earlier efforts, it is by no means certain that that success will continue. For the purpose of presenting what has been said upon this matter I desire to read briefly from page 156 of the testimony. This is the statement of Governor Brodie, the Governor of Arizona Territory. He refers to one of the counties there. We were then at Phoenix:

Pima County, next east of here, is agricultural, mining, and stock raising, mainly.

The second great industry to which he calls attention in that county is that of mining:

That is one of the old original three counties cut up. It is very rich. Tucson is a prosperous town about the size of this, perhaps larger, and is perhaps the third oldest town in the United States. They irrigate there from the waters in the Santa Cruz.

Then he adds this significant fact:

Very few of their mines are now in operation, the reasons being the fall of the price of copper and the cost of freight.

So in Pima County, next east of Phoenix, though a mining county, very few of the mines are now in operation.

It has been said in argument to-day that the result of the finding of precious metals and the development of these mines assures the growth of the country. Is it not and must it not be true that that development may be temporary, and that when the foundation has gone the structure goes with it? Where the population is based upon mining development, when that ceases, will not the population depart?

We visited Bisbee, a city of which I wish to speak. It seemed to an Easterner a marvel of wondrous development—encircled on three sides by hills and mountains. In the lower valley are their business establishments, stores, and hotels. A city has grown up there, we understand, substantially since the census. No criticism can be made of an enumerator who did not find a large number there two years ago, at the time the census was taken, because, as we understand it, the city has been developed practically since, and its growth has been such that to-day it numbers 8,000 or 9,000 people, and 1,800 are employed in a single mine, the Copper Queen.

Now, as to the permanency of such a population a reasonable doubt certainly exists. In the testimony of the representative of a great mining interest at Bisbee is a significant statement which I shall read. The question was asked with reference to his mines:

Q. That is caused by the fact that you follow the veins as they recede?

A. Yes, sir. Well, there are no veins, as a matter of fact. There are isolated deposits in the limestone, and we have to go by guesswork to find them; but when we find them they are very large. (P. 171.)

I would ask at this point whether it is a sure and reliable foundation for a State, a county, or a city when it depends for its growth, its development, its population and resources upon the guesswork of men who are hunting for these isolated deposits in the mountains?

We have, I think, even better evidence than this, and from a witness who certainly can not be said to be prejudiced against the omnibus bill. It is the Delegate from the Territory of Arizona. There are three or four points in his statement to which I desire to call attention. They are all, I believe, material, and have an important bearing upon the question now under consideration. I will read:

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Why are not the mines assessed?
Mr. SMITH. Because they come under the provisions of a Territorial statute passed in the early days that exempted mines from taxation, in an effort to encourage as much as possible the development of the mining industries of the country. Then when the mines grew large and strong they were able to take care of themselves——
Senator BATE. Are mines assessed in any Territory?
Mr. SMITH. Oh, yes.
Senator HEITFELD. They are not assessed in my State.
Senator BATE. Nor in mine.
Mr. SMITH. They were not generally assessed in any of the Territories in the West; and, as I say, when they grew large and strong they were pretty well able to take care of themselves when it came to the question of changing the law as to the assessment of their property.

So it would seem from this statement that there was a power among these mine owners absolutely controlling the Territorial legislature to the extent of preventing the taxation of their property. But the Delegate says:

These conditions will pass away in statehood. I believe, from interviews I have had with them, that the owners of those great mines are to-day willing to pay a net-proceeds tax on them, which is a proper tax.

Certainly these mine owners, some of whom reside outside of the Territory, must be very different from the average property owner if they are willing to pay out of generosity a tax upon their mines. Yet it is seriously asserted that they would willingly and voluntarily pay such a tax if statehood were granted. This is indeed a strange proposition.

But the point I am coming to is this. He says:

A mining tax should always be levied on the net proceeds and not on the property itself, for one year it may be valuable and the next not.

The Delegate's opinion that the value of mining interests is uncertain is surely to be inferred when he says that "one year it may be valuable and the next not." When these mining interests cease to be valuable, would not the business cease, and would not the city dependent upon that business lose its population? Take Bisbee, for instance, which depends absolutely upon this mining interest. How long would Bisbee stand if that mining interest ceased to be profitable, if the property ceased to be valuable, as, according to the statement of the Delegate, it may during the coming year?

Now I desire to call attention to another statement:

At the present time people go right through my country into old Mexico to invest in property that is certainly not half as valuable as that they ride over in going there. Why do they do it? Because there is no stability to our legislation. (P. 324.)

This statement, if I understand it, means that investors pass over Arizona, pass over the line down into old Mexico and invest their money there, because of the want of stability in the Territorial legislature. If that is so, then Mexico has a better government than Arizona, and the inquiry naturally arises why Mexicans living under this unstable government of ours do not go back to their fatherland. Why stay in this Territory of ours? And why do Americans remain there under conditions that lead investors to go beyond the lines of this Territory and purchase property in Chihuahua or some other state of Mexico?

Returning to the question of population and the mining industry, I wish to say that a mining camp is not necessarily an enduring city. It is built for to-day, not for to-morrow, next week, or next year. It depends wholly upon the uncertain finds in the limestone of the mountains.

There is an example of this shown in the statement made by the governor of the Territory, that in one of the counties where mining interests had been important the business had ceased because of a change in the price of copper and the cost of freight. Tombstone was once a city that flourished, had extensive business and a large population, with a promising future, as many would have said.

But what is the fact? Built up with extreme rapidity; twelve or fifteen thousand people were once gathered together in this mining camp, fittingly designated as such, yet two or three years ago there were scarcely 600 people there. I understand that there is some encouragement from later developments, and I believe there is a population now of ten or twelve hundred people; but gone are those days of prosperity. It is indeed a deserted city, a deserted village, and we can think of its inhabitants when departing that "they fold their tents like the Arabs and as silently steal away" from the city which they undoubtedly thought was to be their future home.

I believe that if we are to admit this Territory with certainly less than 100,000 people, exclusive of Indians, we ought to have the assurance at least that the present population would remain and make commendable progress rather than that there should be any uncertainty as to future growth and development.

What the interest of these people may be in the mines, who the mine owners are, whether they will pay taxes or not, whether the mines are of great value to the people beyond the money expended in operating, who can tell? The mines may pour out millions that go into the business and resources of the whole country, but the owners may not be citizens of Arizona; if residents of the States or other Territories, what part of the just profits of the mines would be of local benefit.

It is no pleasure to say anything that would discredit in the least the glowing accounts which have been given of both these Territories. They are a part of our common domain, a part of our own country; and it would be a welcome thing to me to give, if I could truthfully do so, interested as we are in them and for them, a good account of their progress, their prosperity, and their present condition. But if, upon inquiry, we find the facts otherwise, is it not a duty to state them? If these people are asking for admission into the Union, is it not a duty to raise the question whether or not they have the requisite qualifications for such admission?

REPRESENTATION.

There is a particular feature of the bill which I should like to consider for a moment. If Arizona is to have statehood and if a convention is to be called to represent fairly and fully the different counties, the delegates surely should be justly apportioned among the different divisions of the Territory; and, at the risk of being a little tedious, I want to go over some of the facts concerning this representation.

Here is what appears in the bill, which was intended, I suppose, to be fair to all the people of the Territory and to give them a truly representative delegation in the convention that is to form a constitution, should statehood be granted.

Mohave County has a population of 3,426, with a representation of two under the bill if they have a convention; Yuma, with a population of 4,145, would have a representation of two; Santa Cruz, with a population of 4,545, would have two representatives; Gila, with a population of 4,973, would have two representatives; Coconino, with a population of 5,514, would have two representatives; Apache, with a population of 8,297, would have two representatives; Navajo, with a population of 8,829—and that is one to which I desire to call attention—contains two and a half times as many people as Mohave, and yet these two counties are to have the same representation.

Pinal County, with a population of 7,779, would have three representatives; Graham County, with a population of 14,162, would have three, and Pima County, with a population of 14,689, would have three representatives. I am contrasting those two counties of Graham and Pima—the former with a population of 14,162, and the latter with a population of 14,689—with Pinal, having a population of 7,779, which would be given the same representation as these two larger counties, each having nearly double the population of Pinal.

Cochise County, with a population of 9,251, would have four delegates in that convention, while Graham County, with a population of 14,162, and Pima County, with a population of 14,689, would each have only three. Yavapai, with a population of 13,799, would have four delegates, and Maricopa, with a population of 20,457, nearly six times as large as Mohave, would have only two and a half times the representation—five delegates.

I do not suppose that this has any special bearing upon the subject, except to show that there is a disproportion in the representation, and that a grave error has been made in the bill, which ought to be amended, or gross injustice will be done. The injustice of the bill is evident to the people of the Territory, as appears in the protest made by the society known as the Arizona Pioneers. I wish to read just a few words from that protest. It is of considerable length, and I shall read only a paragraph. It is dated "Hall of Arizona Pioneer Society, Tucson, Ariz., November 18, 1902," directed to the chairman of the committee, and signed by Sidney R. De Long, President, Arizona Pioneer Society. The heading is:

Opinion of the Society of Arizona Pioneers, as defined at a full meeting held at their rooms in Tucson, Ariz., November 18, 1902, upon the steps that should be taken in regard to the important question of bringing Arizona into the United States as a sovereign State.

This is the second item in the protest.

Second. The society would respectfully suggest that the bill be amended so that the appointment for delegates to the constitutional convention be made among the several counties of the Territory according to the population by the census of 1900. The governor of the Territory, chief justice, and secretary of the same shall declare the number of delegates for said convention apportioned to each county to be voted for. (P. 168.)

I speak of these details because they are of grave consequence to the people there. If they are to have statehood, there should be fairness and justice in the terms of the bill which grants it to them. If wrong, let the bill be amended, or, better still, let those people, as I have said before, remain as they are until the American spirit and American education have changed and elevated those who are of foreign birth or race and those who are among the illiterate until the number qualified for statehood shall bear some just proportion to the total population of the Republic.

COMPLAINTS.

It is alleged that these people, because of a Territorial government, are suffering from almost intolerable conditions, but nothing has yet appeared to show that their material interests have been wanting in any advantage that statehood could give them. It is said that here is taxation without representation, but all taxes are of their own creation. They make their own laws, and at no time has the authority of Congress over these laws been exercised except at the request of their Delegate or where the people would to-day commend the use of that authority.

An inquiry naturally occurred to the committee as to the character of the officials who have been appointed by the Government. So far as we could learn there was no objection to their Governor. We met him, and I do not believe there is an executive in any one of the States who is his superior. He is a man of intelligence, of great worth, and of true patriotism, who for many years, as an officer in the Regular Army, battled with savage Indians and won distinguished honors. I do not believe that in an election, held however long after statehood is granted, there would be chosen a better man than Governor Brodie.

They have, too, their appointed judges. We found them men of character, men of attainments, men of a high order of ability, good lawyers, and good judges. The people of Phoenix were so proud of their court that they desired us to visit it during one of its sessions. The judge who was then holding court was Judge Kent, who, it happened, was the only one who had come from outside the Territory, as we understood. Judge Kent was the son of a former governor of Maine, well known throughout the country, Governor Kent.

He went from Maine to New York, where he was for a time a student and afterwards a lawyer in large practice. From there, I think, he went to Colorado or to Kansas, and then into this Territory. He is known to some Senators, and is a man who impresses one immediately with his high character, probity, and honor. We went into the room to witness the proceedings of that court. I do not believe there exists in any Eastern or Middle State one whose business is conducted with better order, with more dignity, with more of that which most becomes a court.

We asked, "Are you satisfied with the courts; is everything right with them; is there any scandal connected with them or any evidence of corruption that is now or ever has been existing?" The answers given confirmed our high opinion of their judges. So, then, in this regard, there was no occasion for complaint.

There was this said, however, and it was said with gravity and earnestness as if it were a great and existing evil, that when cases which were tried in a lower court before a certain judge passed by appeal to a higher court the same judge was consulted and participated in the deliberations of the appellate court. When the inquiry was made, "Does that custom exist to-day?" the answer was "No." So all the reason and foundation for that complaint had some time before been removed.

In both these Territories the Governors for some time past have been taken from among their own people. Their judges, as a rule, have been citizens of the Territory where they officiated. So long as they are incorruptible and men of high character performing their judicial duties without giving cause for complaint, surely there is nothing intolerable in this condition.

The question arises, Who wants a change; who desires most that the Territorial condition shall be laid aside and statehood assumed? The natural inquiry is, Who would be most interested in the change? I do not believe it is the agriculturist in those Territories; I do not believe it is the mine owner, or the man who delves in the mines; I do not believe it is the stock raiser who is most interested; but there are those who, with a commendable ambition, seek high honors, and greater honors, of course, would come through statehood. There is the great office of their chief executive, the Governor of their State, which would be an office very honorable, very desirable to fill; and it is not strange that men of aspiring disposition should be ambitious in that direction.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. QUAY. In reference to a point made by the Senator from New Hampshire that the pressure for this bill does not emanate from the people of New Mexico, I would ask that the resolution be read which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks that the resolution referred to by him be read from the desk. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. QUAY. It is a resolution of the legislature of New Mexico, passed unanimously.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

SANTA FE, N. MEX., January 22, 1903.

Hon. B. S. RODEY,
Delegate in Congress, Washington, D. C.:

The following council joint resolution was passed by unanimous vote of both houses of the thirty-fifth legislative assembly of New Mexico to-day:

Joint resolution No. 3.

Be it resolved by the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, That the thanks of the people of the Territory of New Mexico, through their legislative representatives, be, and the same are hereby, extended to the Hon. BERNARD S. RODEY, our Delegate in Congress, for the energetic, earnest, and able services rendered by him before the Congress of the United States in advocating the admission of New Mexico into the Union as a State, and that he is hereby assured of the hearty approval and appreciation of the people of this Territory on account thereof.

Resolved further, That a certified copy of these resolutions, signed by the president of the council and the speaker of the house of representatives, be forwarded to the Hon. BERNARD S. RODEY, and that, in addition thereto, the same be telegraphed thereby to him.

(Signed)
J. FRANCISCO CHAVES,
President of Legislative Council.
NESTOR MONTOYA,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
W. E. MARTIN,
Chief Clerk Council.
CHAS. SAFFORD,
Chief Clerk House of Representatives.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, not only are the politically ambitious concerned about this question of statehood, but there are others. I believe there are great corporate interests concerned about this question; and I can understand how naturally those interests would arise. There are, as everyone knows, great railroad enterprises that are pressing into every Territory, into every new country. They are reaching out for mines wherever there are any; they are reaching out for business wherever it exists; and they are seeking always the favor of cities, towns, counties, and States.

It happens often that two cities not far apart are greatly interested in the question whether a certain railroad shall enter the one or the other. There is then, necessarily, the condition of competing cities that are anxious for railroad privileges, and there are, besides, keen, shrewd railroad men, who are determined, if possible, to take advantage of that condition of affairs. It has been so before, and I believe such a condition exists to-day, and with what result? The result, as everyone knows, would be, if such a condition existed under statehood, that one city or the other would probably secure these railroad privileges by subsidies, by bonds, by gifts that would mortgage the property of the people for years, perhaps scores of years to come. That probably would be the result, as it has been in towns and cities elsewhere when Territories have been made States.

But these people say, "We do not need anybody to take care of us; we are amply able to take care of ourselves." I am not questioning that, but I am suggesting the temptations that would arise. Are the people of these Territories stronger than the people of our States who have yielded to the seductive influences of these mighty corporations? I believe they are surrounded by the same circumstances, and while they can take care of themselves as well as the average people, they are subjected to a most potent influence. I believe that the statement which came to us from Oklahoma is worthy of great consideration: "Let us wait; let us be under the shelter of the Harrison Act for a few years longer. Let us come in then with our railroads built, because they will be built even if we do not give them aid. Then we will have our railroads, and we will not have our cities and towns and counties burdened with a mortgage indebtedness for ourselves and our children and perhaps our children's children."

Some statehood advocates are interested in the pending question in the way I have described, and what do they want? They want to be rid of the effect of one of the most beneficent laws, I believe, that has been given to the country for years. I refer to the well-known Harrison Act. I think it was fully discussed by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], but in this connection I wish to briefly call attention to two sections of that act, and to only parts of those. Section 2 of the act reads:

SEC. 2. That no Territory of the United States, now or hereafter to be organized, or any political or municipal corporation or subdivision of any such Territory, shall hereafter make any subscription to the capital stock of any incorporated company, or company or association having corporate powers, or in any manner loan its credit to or use it for the benefit of any such company or association, or borrow any money for the use of any such company or association.

Section 4 provides—

SEC. 4. That no political or municipal corporation, county, or other subdivision in any of the Territories of the United States shall ever become indebted in any manner or for any purpose to any amount in the aggregate, including existing indebtedness, exceeding 4 per cent on the value of the taxable property within such corporation, county, or subdivision, to be ascertained by the last assessment for Territorial and county taxes previous to the incurring of such indebtedness; and all bonds or obligations in excess of such amount given by such corporation shall be void.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUBOIS in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is it not a known fact that the constitutions of all the States that have been lately admitted into the Union contain just those provisions, and can we not as reasonably suppose that the constitutions of New Mexico and Arizona will contain such provisions as the constitutions of North and South Dakota do?

Mr. BURNHAM. But, Mr. President, what assurance has the Congress of the United States of any such fact or proposition. It is not true certainly in some of the States, unless we have been misinformed upon the floor of the Senate, that that has always been done; and possibly, if I understand this measure and its merits, if it were enacted at all, it might not be done.

Mr. LODGE. At this point I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether he thinks there is peculiar danger in any of these Territories of demands made upon counties and towns for the benefit of railroads? Is there anything in the testimony, which I have not had time to examine with great care, tending to show that?

Mr. BURNHAM. There is nothing definite in the testimony, perhaps, that calls special attention to it, except the general conditions and the testimony before us with respect to large railroad schemes that were about to be developed. A distinguished railroad man of great intelligence was before us and gave an impression of what the railroad interests had been, what they were doing then, what they were going to do, and he made it perfectly apparent—I am glad the Senator has called attention to it—that in that Territory of which I was speaking there were extensive plans for the future, and it concerned the railroad interests greatly whether they could get loans and subsidies from the towns, cities, and counties.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator another question. Is it not a fact that in 1889 a convention was held in the Territory of New Mexico in which they adopted a proposed constitution, and that constitution contained the very inhibitions of which he speaks? That was done by the people of New Mexico. If the people at that time saw fit to adopt such a proposed constitution, is it not reasonable to suppose that probably they would do so again if they had an opportunity?

Mr. BURNHAM. In reply to the distinguished Senator's query, I wish to say that under some conditions and in some places there might be an assurance of that fact; but when I think of New Mexico and that I was told by one of her citizens, the editor of a great paper, who I think has been living there for twenty years and is thoroughly familiar with the people, that a certain element in the population and members of the legislature would assent to almost any proposition, and that he could control by 3,600 majority the county in which he lived, I can not help thinking that possibly there would be influences which could change the wise and honorable position of New Mexico in 1889.

Mr. LODGE. In this connection, if everybody in the Territory is in favor of this inhibition of loaning money by counties and towns to corporations, it seems to me the object could be attained by putting a provision to that effect in the enabling act.

Mr. BURNHAM. That would seem to be the wise and sensible way of disposing of the question.

I believe, as has been stated by the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. BEVERIDGE], that this Territory can afford to wait; that she can afford to wait until her development is greater and her future more assured; that she can afford to wait until the population has reached at least the unit of representation in the House of Representatives. Let her wait until a later day. Let statehood be the prize toward which her efforts shall be directed. Let this reward be given when she shall have reached the required qualifications; when she shall have the population that is requisite; when she shall have removed to a greater extent the bane of illiteracy; when she shall have, perhaps largely through Government aid, that which, I believe, will so benefit the great West—irrigation and the storage of water; when she shall have a broader field of agriculture; when all her interests shall have been largely promoted and increased.

It is said that she wishes to place a star upon our flag and add its light to that of our glorious constellation. But, Mr. President, it seems to me that she should wait until that star is greater and more effulgent, until it would not be dimmed or obscured by the brighter light of others. When that time comes, its place upon our flag will be assured and another will be added to our splendid galaxy of States.

OKLAHOMA.

I desire now to speak about another Territory. We had been in a land where there were desert wastes, where the skies were generally cloudless and but little rain would fall.

When we reached Oklahoma the clouds were thick above us, and different conditions were found everywhere to exist. Trees and forests were often visible, and the country bore evidence of the fact that it was supplied, not by irrigation and the storage of waters, but by natural rain which God had given in abundance. There was evidence of great agricultural development. Everywhere we looked we saw signs of prosperity, splendid farm buildings, houses as you would find them in the middle West or in New England, barns that seemed fitted for man as well as beast. I could not help thinking as I saw them of the contrast with Santa Fe and Las Vegas, where as you went out of the cities a little way you saw strange buildings occupied by a strange race.

I could not help remarking the great contrast, as I saw on the one side prosperity, on the other side, the result of indolence, inactivity and want of progressiveness. There was evidence of the great difference between these Territories, and of the reason why there should have been almost if not quite a hundred thousand people coming within a week's time into one Territory, and in another, Arizona, not a hundred thousand white people during centuries of Mexican occupation and almost forty years of Territorial government.

The Indian reservations in Oklahoma, as appears by the report of the Indian Affairs Commissioner, amount to 3,651,518 acres. In the rest of that grand domain of nearly 25,000,000 acres it is said that almost every quarter section is taken up by men interested in agriculture. If that is true, it is surely a marvelous growth in this short period of time. The remarkable history and development of the Territory are so well stated by the Governor that I ask the privilege of reading an extract from his report. In speaking of Oklahoma historically he goes back to the old Louisiana purchase, and says:

For more than two hundred years prior to the time of the acquisition of this land by the United States people of the Old World, particulary the Spaniards, entertained exaggerated ideas of great treasures of gold and silver which might be obtained by him who was fortunate enough to reach the fabled fairyland of the Southwest in safety. (P. 5.)

It seems that Spanish adventurers years ago were seeking for gold and silver. They did not find these treasures, but the Americans of to-day, going from the North, the South, the East, and the West, have found something better than mines, something more certain and reliable than copper deposits. They have found a rich soil and greater riches than the mountains can afford—the fruits of the soil.

The Governor continues:

Oklahoma was formed because of the demands of a great class of energetic people who must have a country in which to give vent to the spirit of progress which was swaying and urging them on, who longed to break away from the environments of the older States and to form a new empire in the Southwest. Year after year a little band of energetic westerners, known as Oklahoma "boomers," led by Payne and Couch, endeavored to convince Congress of the necessity of the new State. It was a struggle, long and weary, to those most interested. From about the year 1872 to March, 1889, the boomers haunted the Halls of Congress, when at last their faithful efforts were rewarded by an act which provided for opening to settlement on April 22, 1889—

A date which I believe will be forever fixed in the minds of Americans throughout the country, fixed forever in the minds of the people of that splendid Territory—original Oklahoma, composed of nearly 3,000,000 acres of fertile land in the center of the Territory.

This was the first opening to settlement of land, which has been added to until to-day we have the Territory of Oklahoma.

The country was opened at noon on that day and taken possession of by people who were waiting along the line on every side—some on fleet-footed horses, others on foot, and thousands in covered wagons with their families and all their worldly goods—determined to obtain a home in the coveted land. It was a sight never to be forgotten by those who witnessed it. The thousand of immigrants pouring in from all directions demonstrated how much the country was needed and wanted by the home builder. By dark on April 22 but little of original Oklahoma remained without a settler, and great cities were built up almost by magic. The Territorial form of government was established in June, 1890, and about that time No Man's Land, now Beaver County, of 3,681,000 acres, was added to Oklahoma. In September, 1891, 1,282,434 acres in the Sac and Fox and Pottawatomie Indian reservations were opened to settlement in the same manner as that of the original opening. The next lands to be allotted and given to the homesteader were the Cheyenne and Arapaho reservations, in April, 1892. (P. 6.)

I will not dwell upon this statement. It shows the continuous development of these reservations when opened to general settlement.

Further along in the same statement it appears that—

The population of Oklahoma, as shown by the returns of the county assessors, is 541,480. This shows a gain over 1901 of 143,149, or nearly 36 per cent.

In a single year the Territory of Oklahoma has gained more than the white population of Arizona and more than the total American population of New Mexico.

This enumeration indicates an average of 14 persons to the square mile on an area of 38,830 square miles. (P. 7.)

As against a distribution of 1.1 or thereabouts in New Mexico and Arizona, we find 14 persons to the square mile in this area of 38,830 square miles.

Further along I wish to call attention to the valuation of property:

The valuation of property as returned for taxation for 1902 was $72,677,423, showing, as compared with the tax valuation of 1901 ($60,464,696), an increase of $12,212,727. (P. 9.)

A remarkable gain in the short period of a year.

The Governor states another fact, of importance because it relates to the public schools:

The school system of Oklahoma is at once the pride and glory of the growing Commonwealth. Our material progress is remarkable; our educational advancement phenomenal. The care taken to enlighten the growing generation is the State's assurance of its future moral and political strength.

* * * * * * *

The public-school system embraces the rural schools, consisting of the primary and grammar or immediate grades; the secondary school, including the high school and the university preparatory school; the normal schools; the agricultural and mechanical colleges, and the university.

Then, with reference to the support of the schools, this statement is made:

The school is supported by a district tax voted at the annual meeting, by a county school fund arising from a tax levied by the county commissioners, and by a Territorial fund accruing from the apportionment of the income from the leasing of the school lands. This Territorial fund is apportioned in January and July. The apportionment for the school year ending July 30, 1902, was $1.84 per capita for all children of school age. It will thus be seen that abundant provision has been made for the financial support of a strong and effective school system.

The law also provides for a school library in every school district (pp. 23, 24).

I think it doubtful if any of the States of the middle West or elsewhere makes more ample provision for school purposes than does the Territory of Oklahoma. Even a school library is provided for every school district.

I intend to speak briefly of the growth and development of Oklahoma, and then to refer to what I understand is the real issue involved; that is, whether Oklahoma and the Indian Territory shall come into the Union as one State, or whether they shall remain as they are, separate, or whether Oklahoma alone shall be admitted.

There are certain significant facts that relate to the growth of this Territory. One of them is this, which comes from Bradstreet's Business Return. It shows the growth in the business and in the number of firms. Two and a half years ago there were 3,800 business firms in Oklahoma. In July, 1902, there were 8,243 business firms. They considerably more than doubled the number during that brief period of time, and the credit of their business men, I am told, is unsurpassed.

Those great business agencies are commended for the remarkable fact that with scarcely an exception their business has been successful. It is stated by the same source that their paper, their securities, are sought for in the Eastern markets as much as those from any other locality. It is a little strange that Territorial government which in Arizona and in New Mexico is such a bar, as is claimed, to progress, does not so operate in Oklahoma. Here credit is unsurpassed, and it is illustrated by the single fact that, I think, at Oklahoma City, municipal bonds, bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent for thirty years, were sold at 2 per cent premium.

There are business houses, as we were told, in Oklahoma City doing at the rate of a million and a half or two million dollars of business a year. At the railroad station, a small station, the receipts were very large. It was said by one whom we believed that more than three million dollars were collected at the little station in Oklahoma City from freights, and the fares of passengers during a single year. Their prosperity has been evidenced in the way I have stated. It was plain when we came to visit their cities.

While the cities in the other Territories were remarkable, and while in all of them there was much to commend, and of this we have spoken, we found as good conditions, and in some respects better, in this new-born Territory, where during the ten or twelve years past they have built up twenty cities, and where Oklahoma City is said to have a population of 20,000 to 25,000 (I think the exact number given was 22,000), where they have brick blocks three, four, and five stories high, magnificent blocks, evidences of thrift and prosperity which were perfectly apparent. Inside those blocks was going on the great business to which I have referred.

In Oklahoma City they were then constructing a street railway. People had come there, as they said, from every State in the Union—enterprising, active, thrifty people had come there, many of them young men with their wives, with their little families. They had come there to make progress, to better their condition in life, not to live upon the fortunes of old people, but out of that new land to carve fortunes for themselves.

Then, there was another fact which was noticeable, and that was that rarely did one see a foreign face. All were bright, intelligent, American-looking people. There were no outskirts to that city which would attract attention discreditably, but all were people whom we would like to meet and would be glad to fraternize with. They were all apparently like the best citizens we met in the other Territories. There were only a few of foreign race. I think the percentage has been given, and it is remarkably small.

Then, too, illiteracy, which we found bearing so heavily upon one of the Territories, was practically absent. The percentage of literacy there is far better than in most of the States on the same parallel—as good as in some of our New England States, and perhaps better.

For their public schools, as I have said, they expended a large amount that came from the income of the Government, but they were not content with taking $300,000 from the Government, and leaving that to be the only amount to expend for schools. They were putting their hands into their own pockets and contributing liberally from their own resources for the benefit of the public schools.

A statement has been made which, I think, is true, although, of course, we can not personally verify it; if true, it is most remarkable. In the two other Territories we rode for miles—aye, scores of miles—without a human habitation in sight, with no place of rest for man or beast, but it is said that you can not in Oklahoma, go whatever way you will, on rail or road, get out of sight of an excellent American schoolhouse.

Here is found the true foundation, upon which all States should be built, a new and splendid common-school system. In that Territory I believe the public schools are sustained as liberally as anywhere, and they are building the firm foundation for a Commonwealth, a result that will surely come when the Indian Territory, no longer divorced, shall be restored to its old union.

SINGLE STATEHOOD.

So I come to this question of single statehood. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has voiced much, however, that it was my purpose to say, and voiced it so much better than I that I feel like leaving it entirely where he left it when he referred to the deplorable condition in the Indian Territory. Speaking briefly, I will say, as I understand it, there are no public highways, no roads built at public expense, none except what the owners of the soil could prevent passage over. There are private ways, but no public roads.

But what is more grievous than all, by a strange neglect, all through that Territory, except in the towns where there are municipal organizations and except where there are little subscription schools, there is no system of education. It is not strange that children from that Territory are trying to make their voices heard in this Chamber. Indeed, conditions are so deplorable that I believe it can not lie in the heart of any Senator or member of the House to long delay a radical change in some way of those conditions. It seems to me that the union of the Indian Territory with Oklahoma and consequent legislation will help to solve this question and bring these children under the benefit of education and that whole Territory under better government.

While we were at Oklahoma City and Guthrie over 20 witnesses appeared before the committee for the purpose of testifying. Some of them came as volunteers, and gave us their statements upon this very question as to what is for the interest both of the Indian Territory and of Oklahoma. A majority of these 20 or more witnesses came from Oklahoma; one was the mayor of Oklahoma City. They were business men, intelligent and capable of forming a fair and honest judgment, and nearly all were in favor of single statehood now, by which they meant the union of these Territories as one Commonwealth.

That was the testimony of all but three or four. The statement of these few was in substance "that some time these two lands must be united as one State, but that temporarily it is better that they remain apart until changes in reference to taxation and other matters," which were referred to, "prepare the Indian Territory for this union." To that proposition there was decided objection by the 16 or 17 who gave a different opinion. From their definite and positive statement we were given to understand that almost the universal sentiment of those parts of the Territories with which they were acquainted was in favor of single statehood.

There have been several conventions. One was at South McAlester in December, 1900, one at Muskogee in November, 1901, and another at Claremore in December, 1902. Every one of these conventions, as I am informed, earnestly favored the claims of single statehood.

But there was another convention, a great convention, held no longer ago than the 6th of this very month, a convention which it seems to me should attract wide attention. I want to present a newspaper I have here. It is a paper published in Oklahoma City, and contains an account of this convention. I have read the article through, and find that the headlines do not misstate or exaggerate what appears in the article. I should like to read these lines, because they inform us, in brief and expressive terms, of the character of the meeting:

Five thousand men shouted for a single State—The greatest convention ever held for any purpose in either Territory was held here yesterday, and went on record for single statehood for Indian Territory and Oklahoma combined—A great procession paraded the streets, accompanied by four bands, amid great enthusiasm—One thousand delegates called, 2,000 responded—Three thousand more came to add force and enthusiasm—Osage Indian made temporary chairman.

The last fact is significant. It has been claimed I think, either in letters or in statements of some form, that all of the Indian people are opposed to this union. Certainly two of the officers of the meeting were Indians, and large representations from the different tribes and nations of Indians were in attendance. If I can infer anything from the spirit and unanimity of this convention, it is that the Indian tribes and nations are not opposed to the union of these Territories, but are decidedly in favor of it.

Osage Indian made temporary chairman and a member of the Cherokee council elected permanent chairman of the convention—Indian Territory furnished 3,000 and Oklahoma 2,000 of those in attendance—Resolutions demanding union in one State of the two Territories were passed with a tremendous shout from thousands of representative people, and reference to this provision of the Beveridge bill receive cheers from the assembled multitude—The attendance far exceeded the combined attendance at every previous statehood convention ever held in either Territory—An upheaval of the people against the iniquitous omnibus bill that amounted to a veritable landslide of opposition against that nefarious proposed measure—Protest against disunion. (The Daily Oklahoman, January 7, 1903.)

I want to submit that a convention of 5,000 people, 3,000 from the Indian Territory and 2,000 from Oklahoma, is as much evidence of a popular sentiment that should be considered as can be found in the prepared and engineered resolutions that any legislature could pass.

I have noted in reading this article that the convention was presided over by leading men. I have read the speeches of these men. They are concise, logical, and forcible expressions of their wish for single statehood and of their reasons why it should be granted now. The officers of the convention and those attending were, as I am informed, representative men of the two Territories. There were representatives of the Indian nations, who are said to be against the union of the Territories.

That convention spoke for the two Territories. It spoke for organic union, and all its members declared in convention resolutions and in public speech that they were looking forward as to manifest destiny to the reuniting of a people which had been for a brief time separated and broken apart.

There is a message which I will read because it contains the well-expressed opinion of an intelligent citizen and official, a veto message from former Governor Barnes, dated March 9, 1899.

[At this point Mr. BURNHAM yielded the floor for the day.]

Tuesday, January 27, 1903.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, I shall occupy only a brief period in concluding my remarks upon the pending bill. However, before proceeding with this discussion I desire to say a word in reply to an observation made yesterday as to the length of time occupied by me in this discussion.

I have had the privilege of addressing the Senate on three occasions and each time my remarks have been divided and widely separated by the speeches of others, and many of those speeches have been made by Senators who are in favor of the pending bill.

On Friday last, when I yielded the floor, I was referring to a veto message made by the governor of Oklahoma, and was about to read a brief extract from that message. It appears that a bill was passed by the legislative assembly asking for statehood and for a constitutional convention, and providing that the Indian Territory should be added by piecemeal. On the 9th of March, 1899, the Governor returned a message to the honorable council of the legislative assembly in which occur these words:

With the Indian Territory incorporated with Oklahoma in one State we would place a star upon the flag of our country whose luster would not be dimmed by the constellation of magnificent States by which we are surrounded. Our varied resources of timber, mineral, agricultural, and grazing land would forever furnish the necessary supplies to pay the expenses of a first-class State government, and enable us to build and maintain penal, reformatory, and eleemosynary institutions that would compare favorably with those of the most advanced and progressive people, and all without the people who must always pay the taxes for the support of the government, feeling in the slightest degree the burden of excessive demand by the tax-gatherers. On the other hand, Oklahoma, with her resources restricted to agriculture and the raising of cattle, without the hope even of development of coal or other minerals in paying quantities, or the development of manufacturing industries, would be but a weak and feeble commonwealth in the great sisterhood of States.

I have found in the consideration of this question from statements of witnesses and from conventions that a great majority of the people of both these Territories desire single statehood. They find that the Territory of Oklahoma has 39,000 square miles, the Indian Territory 31,000 square miles, together making 70,000 square miles; and when they look abroad over the borders of their Territories they find that the average area of the States and Territories west of the Mississippi River is more than 100,000 square miles. Looking south, they find the magnificent empire of Texas, with 265,000 square miles. It is not strange that Oklahoma does not wish to stand alone with its comparatively small area. It is not strange that the Indian Territory wishes to join with her in making the 70,000 square miles, for even when united they will have only 70 per cent of the average area referred to.

Again, we find an opinion expressed among these people that the resources and conditions of these two Territories are such that they ought to be united. Oklahoma is an agricultural country. Its people are engaged in farming and, to some extent, in stock raising, while in the Indian Territory there is the complement to all this. There are grand coal mines—it is said enough to supply the whole United States. There may be found natural oil, timber, asphalt, and other minerals, which give promise of resources almost untold. There, too, are other conditions which seem naturally to unite these two Territories into one.

Another reason expressed by these people is that if these resources are united, an immense property would be subject to taxation, and the divided expense of a State would be comparatively small. They would find that in this way they could build their capitol, construct and maintain all their public buildings, and carry on their government at a very much less expense than they could with a divided territory. United, as they say, they would have conditions that would be most favorable to them; they would have area that would be respectable, resources that would commend them in comparison with other States and Territories.

Now, it seems the objection has been made that property in the Indian Territory would not be subject to taxation. I understand that the work of the Dawes Commission is practically finished; that the Creek and Seminole allotments have been made, and that the allotments of the Cherokees, Choctaws, and Chickasaws in twelve months or a year and a half will be completed; the mineral lands of the Choctaws and Chickasaws will soon be sold under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and then all these lands will be subject to taxation.

Only homesteads will be for any considerable time inalienable and exempt from taxation, and these amount to a little over 2,000,000 acres. There will be subject to taxation now or in the near future more than 17,000,000 acres—in exact figures, 17,226,558 acres—while in value the property that will in a very short time—perhaps as soon as the State government could be organized—be subject to taxation will be eighty-five millions, and in a few years seventy-five millions more of taxable value will be added to that, making the large amount of $160,000,000. The resources and area of the united Territories would certainly entitle them to statehood.

Another fact to which attention has been called is this: Oklahoma has been enlarged in area from time to time by the purchase and settlement of Indian lands; these lands have been attached to Oklahoma, and in this way we have created by grant an agricultural Territory. But we find peculiar boundaries. The people take exception to these boundaries; they describe them as crooked, zigzag, fantastic, and nondescript; the schoolboy would find it difficult to trace them when hunting, as he may be in his geography, for a description of this Territory. They desire that the old lines may be restored, and that the old Indian Territory as it was may exist again under a State government with the name of Oklahoma.

These are considerations which I believe are worthy of attention; they afford some ground why we should adopt the substitute bill rather than keep, for the time at least, these Territories separate. We find that in both Territories under one organization are the different church societies. There is the Episcopal society in both Territories under a single government. Then, too, there is a Catholic society under a single bishop. So it is with the Epworth League and with other church organizations. They have come together in this way by social organizations formed years ago, because they understood that in a short time there would be one people, one State, and a common destiny for them all. Besides, there are certain organizations of a fraternal character, the Masonic and other kindred associations, where there is but a single head, a central organization; they were united together under this single head and were formed in the belief that ultimately these Territories would be united. They ask to-day that that understanding, as they claim it to have been, shall be carried out and that there shall not be two separate governments in these Territories.

Again, we found upon inquiry in Oklahoma that there were business organizations in Oklahoma City and elsewhere, wholesale establishments, that had one central organization for both Territories; these organizations were represented before the committee. It was their earnest wish and opinion that single statehood should be granted, and they made it evident that it is for the business interests of the people that they should be united.

So, then, not only church and fraternal organizations, but great business interests ask that these Territories be made one State. The business interests of Oklahoma City and elsewhere are certainly important. It is said that $19,000,000 of business was done in that city alone during the past year, and that business there is rapidly increasing.

Now, it may be said that the omnibus statehood bill contemplates a future and possible union of these Territories. Single statehood, which is incorporated in this substitute bill, means the immediate consummation of the hopes of these people. It means that they shall be attached together now and that they shall possess that high rank which they think they are entitled to. In this matter they have the pride and the ambition that is natural to men, a sentiment perhaps, yet indeed a power and a moving force. While the omnibus statehood bill means either two States permanently or single statehood long deferred by an attachment process, resulting in general disappointment.

We are asked by the omnibus bill to do what the people, as I understand it, do not desire. If this bill should pass we would be attempting to impose upon an unwilling people that which is undesirable and against their wishes.

We would be attempting to deprive the people of the Indian Territory of what they believe to be their just rights. In the first place, when this omnibus bill, if it is ever passed, becomes a law a constitutional convention will be called and delegates sent, not from the Indian Territory, but from Oklahoma alone. Then will a constitution be prepared and adopted, not by the Indian Territory delegates, but by those of Oklahoma alone; and if hereafter the Indian Territory should be added its people would be living under a government whose fundamental law they took no part in framing.

In the matter of locating a State capital and other public buildings the voices of the Indian Territory would not be heard. They would have nothing to do with the establishment of the government. If by this attachment process, as it is called, tract after tract of land is to be taken away from the Indian Territory and added to Oklahoma, we should surely find that there would be sectional lines that would create disagreement and an animosity it would take generations to allay.

It would seem to me that we should consult the interests of the people of both these Territories, and particularly the people of the Indian Territory, who would say "no" to this proposition if allowed to act, because of the simple fact that there would be constituted a government under which they may live eventually and in the formation of which they would have no voice. This certainly is not democratic; it is not republican.

Both of these Territories are to-day ready for statehood. The population of both is something like a million. More than 90 per cent are Americans, they are of the best people of the whole land, and their resources combined, are far beyond any reasonable requirement.

Another fact is noticeable. In Oklahoma are brought together the interests of the North and South. The conditions of climate and soil are such that both sections are represented in its products. We find that in adjacent fields wheat and corn and cotton have been raised.

Here men are laboring who came from all parts of our country, from the North and from the South, and here are illustrated to some extent those conditions that were anticipated years ago by a Northern poet, who during the storms of civil war looked out into the future and predicted that the time would come when—

> * * * North and South, together brought, *
> Shall own the same electric thought;
> In peace a common flag salute,
> And side by side in labors free
> And unresentful rivalry
> Harvest the fields wherein they fought.
> —Whittier's "Snow-Bound."

Here, too, is an assured future. Men here are devoted to the cultivation of the soil. They have come from distant States; they have come with their families; they have come to stay. They find the conditions favorable, and there is no reason why they should leave. They have erected substantial buildings—buildings that are to last for years and years—resembling those in the most prosperous parts of our country. So we say that here is an assured future; that these people are to remain because they love the land of their adoption. Cities and villages here are never spoken of as camps; rather are they described as the splendid growing cities of the Southwest.

These Territories are to develop and grow for years to come, and they will be in their strength and in their prosperity as endurable as the Republic. In the organic law of Oklahoma, which I have before me, it is written that whenever the Indian tribes give assent that disposition may be made of their lands, then by proclamation of the President this fact is declared accomplished, and these lands become at once a part of the Territory. Such lands have been annexed from time to time, and these people must have understood from these proceedings and from the organic law that it was intended that the Indian Territory and Oklahoma should be united into one, and that both together should form one great State.

Another fact of importance is that when commissions were sent by the Government to negotiate treaties with Indians in reference to their lands, no instructions were given to make provision for a school fund, so it must have been the expectation of the Government that these two Territories would not always remain separate.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the point was made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] that there were no Government lands in the Indian Territory which could be set apart for school purposes. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM] was mentioning that point just before his last sentence; and I should like to ask the Senator this question: Would that defect, if it be a defect, be in any respect cured by annexing the Indian Territory hereafter? Would there hereafter be any more school lands from which the schools of the Indian Territory could be built than there are now?

Mr. BURNHAM. I do not understand there would be, if I get the meaning of the Senator's question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. My question is this: The Senator from Ohio objected to the substitute bill on the ground that it was an injustice to Oklahoma, for he said the Indian Territory as a State would be without schools. He said there is no Government land which can be donated to them for school purposes, and, therefore, Oklahoma would have to bear the expense of her schools. Now, even if the Indian Territory were made a part of the State by what is known down there, and very aptly known, as the attachment process, a piece at a time, would that remedy or improve that condition? Would there be any more Government land then than there is now? From what source could the schools of the Indian Territory be built hereafter any more than they could if admitted as a single State?

Mr. BURNHAM. I do not understand that the Indian Territory, under the conditions stated by the Senator from Ohio, would receive any possible advantage. The conditions exist there which have been stated, and there is no advantage that can possibly come to the Indian Territory by any proposition which is made in the omnibus bill.

The conditions in the Indian Territory to which attention has just been called excite our interest and enlist our sympathy. I believe we should give attention and especial consideration to the deplorable fact that in the Indian Territory there is no public-school system, that the children are growing up in a way that is unfortunate for them and unfortunate for the Republic, and that provision should be made for the interest of those children.

They have already made their appeal to us and are asking that there may be public schools in that Territory and school buildings whose doors may be opened wide to their eager entrance.

To-day there is practically a united sentiment, as I believe, in both these Territories in favor of their union. The testimony of witnesses, taken by the committee, goes far to establish this fact, and the convention of January last—called for no partisan object, but to give expression to the will of the people—confirms that belief. When 5,000 representative citizens from Oklahoma and the Indian Territory unite, without a dissenting voice or an opposing vote, in the adoption of resolutions and a memorial favoring single statehood and opposing the omnibus bill; when business men greatly interested in this question, organizations of the church, and fraternities favor the report of the committee; when the present and future interests of all these people would be promoted by legislation that would unite them together; when nature itself, in its distribution of the material resources of both Territories, giving to one what it has denied to the other, indicates that they should be joined under one government—how, with all these conditions conclusively showing what ought to be the decision of the present Congress, can support be given to such a measure as the omnibus bill?

CONCLUSION.

I need not repeat the objections that have been so fully and forcibly expressed, in the committee's report and by Senators who have preceded me, to the admission of New Mexico and Arizona. One of these Territories is wanting in population and in the requisite quality of citizenship, and by reason of her location in the midst of the arid regions, can give no assurance of a greatly increased growth and development in the near future. The other, with even a less number of inhabitants, can rest her expectations of future progress only upon the uncertain ground that mining interests will increase where they have sometimes failed, and agriculture develop where now are desert wastes. Her present condition does not entitle her to statehood; her future growth is too uncertain.

To these two Territories now demanding admission, I believe the only answer that ought, in justice to the whole Republic, to be given is: "Not yet."

Oklahoma and the Indian Territory present a different condition. Population, resources, character of citizenship, and the certainty of future progress and development, all combine to give to both, united under one government, an unquestionable right to admission as a sovereign State.

The importance of the questions involved in the pending measure can not be overestimated. Legislation that admits a State is not for to-day, the next month, or the next year, but is, as Webster said, for all time. If there is a doubt even as to the justice and expediency of admitting a Territory, why should not that doubt stand as a bar to its admission?

Very serious and important reasons are shown why New Mexico and Arizona should not be admitted now, but, "at the proper time, to be judged of by the Congress of the United States," as written in the old Mexican treaty. We trust that these two Territories may be added to our American Union, and that Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, reunited, may soon be granted single statehood and take their place in the advancing line of the great Republic.

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN S. LITTLE,

OF ARKANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, January 25, 1903,

On the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted, the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of Hon. JOHN L. SHEPPARD, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Texas.

"Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a faithful and distinguished public servant, the House, at the conclusion of the memorial proceedings of this day, shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk be, and is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased."

Mr. LITTLE said:

Mr. SPEAKER:

The dead are like the stars by day,
Withdrawn from mortal eye;
But not extinct, they hold their way
In glory through the sky.

Mr. Speaker, in life we are in the midst of death, none knowing upon whom the lot shall next fall. Who among us gave more promise of life and illustrious usefulness to his people and his country than did our deceased colleague, the Hon. JOHN L. SHEPPARD, for whom we mourn to-day?

A man of sturdy habits and happy disposition, loved and loving, and enjoying the highest confidence and esteem of those with whom he was associated in legislative and social life. Not only this, Mr. Speaker, but enjoying that confidence and support of his constituency at home that made him bold and fearless in their defense and ever watchful of their smallest interest.

This was his happy condition the day he was stricken with the fatal malady that at last claimed him as its victim. I remember with pain and sorrow the sadness that pervaded this House when the news of his sickness and probable death was whispered from ear to ear among his associates. Wonder and sorrow filled every heart, and all were dumb before the mysteries of Providence, and we exclaim:

Man cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down: he fleeth also as a shadow, and continueth not.

Mr. Speaker, having served with Mr. SHEPPARD upon one of the important committees in this House, and having watched his course with friendly pride, I find comfort in bearing testimony to the fact that as a member of this body he was faithful, intelligent, and efficient. He was not only zealous, but was active and earnest in the performance of his duties, and especially so when the interests of his district or his constituents were to be effected.

A man of positive convictions, and fearless in the expression or defense of them; a man of undoubted ability, possessed of all the elements that go to make up the valuable, effective, and safe legislator, he was genial and kind in his intercourse with his fellow-members, always candid, but courtly. So much in evidence were these splendid traits of character that it can be truthfully said that he had the confidence and esteem of the members of this House with whom he served; that in life he was honored and loved, and in death he is mourned by them.

Mr. Speaker, occurences like this bring us face to face with the mysteries of death and the greater mysteries of life. Man's existence and destiny are wrapped in mystery, and only for the Book of Books and the hope and faith it inspires all would be gloom and darkness at the beginning and at the end of life.

Most wondrous book! bright candle of the Lord!
Star of eternity! the only star
By which the bark of man could navigate
The sea of life, and gain the coast of eternal bliss.

But, Mr. Speaker, while we feel the loss of his companionship, his family the loss of his protection and love, and his district and the great State of Texas, which he in part represented, lost a faithful son and consecrated public service, yet, why should we mourn?

It is written that all must die. No one is exempt from this universal decree, and while we live to die, yet let us bind the fact close to our hearts that we must die to live evermore. Death is but the golden key that unlocks the door to that eternal palace that grants us the crown of everlasting joy and happiness.

Our brother has only beaten us in the race and won the crown that knows no pain or tears. Lived honored and loved; died regretted and mourned, and by an honest devoted life won for himself that bliss that awaits only the good. He is gone from us.

Yet shall we meet again in peace,
To sing the song of festal joy,
Where none shall bid our gladness cease,
And none our fellowship destroy.
There hand in hand, firm linked at last,
And heart to heart enfolded all,
We'll smile upon the troubled past,
And wonder why we wept at all.

The Life and Character of the Late Hon. John L. Sheppard.

OF

HON. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, January 25, 1903,

On the following resolutions—

"Resolved, That in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted, the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of Hon. JOHN L. SHEPPARD, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Texas.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said:

Mr. SPEAKER: JOHN L. SHEPPARD, in honor of whose memory we meet to mourn to-day, was a native of the great State whose commission I have the honor to hold as a member of this House. Alabama has furnished to the nation and to her sister States many men of whom she well may be proud. From the Golden Gate of California to the storm-swept shores of New England we find Alabamians who have occupied exalted positions on the bench and at the bar, who have been the foremost leaders in debate and the performance of high ideals in the National Congress, who have been honored by many States in being selected to administer the laws as their chief executive. In business and science they have kept pace with the foremost in the land, and those who have known and associated with the late JOHN L. SHEPPARD knew him to be a man who was the peer of any of the proud sons of his native State.

He was a man of great determination and force of character, possessed of high ideals and an indomitable determination to do only that which was right, but with all the force and will he possessed he was a man, except when duty called him to act otherwise, of a kindly, sympathetic, and retiring disposition, so much so that it was necessary to see him when duty called him to the front, or to know him intimately, to realize his real ability and the force and high character of the man. He was a valuable member of the House of Representatives, and both his State and his country have lost a useful legislator. His kindness to his friends and his earnest desire to serve them at all times, even at personal sacrifices to himself, have made them feel more keenly his loss. In his death we not only mourn the loss of a friend, a kind and considerate colleague, but we will feel his loss as an able adviser in the legislative halls, and a tireless worker for the good of his State and country.

The worldly hope men set their hearts upon
Turns ashes—or it prospers; and anon,
Like snow upon the desert's dusty face,
Lighting a little hour or two—was gone.

To exclude the business of "wild-cat insurance" from the use of the mails when those engaged therein fail to comply with the laws of the State or Territory wherein they are domiciled or have their headquarters will greatly aid the several States in regulating this nefarious business.

OF

HON. JOHN W. GAINES,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, January 17, 1903,

On the bill (S. 569) to create a new executive department of the Government to be known as the department of commerce and labor.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I have already shown that the Supreme Court of the United States has held that "insurance is not commerce" in Hooper's case, 155 United States Supreme Court Report, and that Congress can not control the business of insurance under its grant of power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce.

However, Congress can exclude from the use of the mails objectionable business, and has done so, instances of which are obscene literature and lotteries.

The Louisiana lottery was driven out of business in the United States by excluding it from the use of the mails, and the law so operating was upheld in the noted Rapier case.

Let Congress, then, at once exclude what is known as wild-cat insurance business from the use of the mails.

Such a law would greatly aid the States in regulating the business of insurance.

The States can not control our postal service, since Congress has the exclusive right to do so.

These wild-cat insurance concerns do not employ agents, who are and can be easily reached by State laws, but do employ our mail service as their exclusive agent to start and carry on their nefarious business.

I repeat here, briefly, the way they operate. Those desiring to engage in this objectionable business will go, say, to New Jersey, and procure a charter without complying with the "operating" laws of that State, for the reason, they say, "we are going to operate in another State; we won't, therefore, hurt the people of New Jersey."

They then go, say, to Chicago and hire office rooms, get a desk, and are possibly licensed; but not desiring to do, and in fact not doing, any insurance business in Illinois, they refrain from complying with the laws of that State, which we class "operating" laws, enacted to protect the people from such frauds.

The State officials excuse them for noncompliance because they are going to operate, and do operate, in another State or States.

They then go out and buy the city directories of several cities, say in Tennessee and Kentucky, pick out the names of, say, the laboring class (who have no time to investigate and are not fully advised of the wily ways of the world), and they at once write to them, and they become soon the victims of this "wild cater," who sits in his office in Chicago and writes to whom he pleases, taking the names from his directories, and enters into insurance arrangements with such people as he can entice into his net by offering "cheap rates" and safe insurance, etc.

Observe that the mail service is the only agent used in negotiating this insurance, over which the States have no control.

The insurance commissioners know nothing of the undertaking (no agent appears in the State of the insured) for the reason stated—the whole contract is arranged through the mail.

When a loss occurs, when the little cabin is burnt down, the whole thing comes to light, but no redress can be had, and if it could be the insurer started out a bankrupt, no paid-up capital, no money, no nothing, to liquidate the loss, and why? Because he has failed to comply with the operating laws both of New Jersey and particularly of Illinois, the State of his domicile or headquarters.

Why should such insidious robbery be aided by the Federal Government allowing its mail service to be used to aid and encourage the execution of such a fraudulent business?

Let Congress exclude such lawless and immoral concerns from the use of the mails. Force all insurance concerns to comply fully with all the laws of the State or Territory wherein such concerns or persons are domiciled or have their headquarters, and where they insure, I may add.

This, as stated, will not hinder, but greatly aid, the States in preventing such objectionable insurance and save the people from great distress and loss of money and property.

At a meeting of the recent national convention of insurance commissioners of our several States, Mr. Reau E. Folk, insurance commissioner and treasurer of Tennessee, introduced a resolution, which was adopted by this body, requesting Congress to thus exclude "wild-cat insurance" from our mails. Mr. Folk is a most intelligent, able, honorable, and patriotic officer and citizen.

I submit, in further extending my remarks under the rule, without comment, his letter to me, including a copy of this resolution, his argument in favor of the passage of such a law, and a copy of his bill:

DEPARTMENT OF INSURANCE, STATE OF TENNESSEE,
Nashville, January 15, 1903.

Hon. J. W. GAINES, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am sending you herewith copies of bill which I have drafted which seeks to deny the use of the mails to insurance companies not authorized by their home States. This bill is in accordance with the unanimous recommendation of the insurance commissioners convention at Columbus, Ohio, in September, 1902.

The bill is a reproduction of the present postal fraud law with insurance feature added.

I have written the various insurance commissioners, requesting them in turn to write their representatives in Congress urging their support of this measure. I have informed them that you will introduce the bill in the House.

You ask me for a statement of some of the reasons for the passage of this bill. I inclose herewith a statement in which I have briefly tried to go into some of the arguments.

If it is necessary to secure the passage of the bill that some of the insurance commissioners should be on hand, I think I could have several of them, including the president of the convention, meet with me in Washington.

Let me hear from you at your earliest convenience.

Yours, very truly,

REAU E. FOLK,
Insurance Commissioner.

Mr. Folk incloses the following resolution, including his explanation of his bill:

The legislation proposed by this bill is in accordance with the unanimous recommendation of the National Convention of Insurance Commissioners, held at Columbus, Ohio, in September, 1902.

The following is the resolution adopted by this convention:

"Whereas it is known to the insurance departments of the various States that certain concerns styling themselves 'insurance companies,' and purporting to write fire insurance are operating throughout the country, not only without regard to the insurance laws of the various States in which they seek patronage, but without authority of the insurance departments of the States wherein their headquarters are located; and

"Whereas it is the plan of procedure of these so-called insurance companies, in order to evade State laws, to refrain from seeking any business in the State of their headquarters, and in order to evade the laws of other States to refrain from sending agents into such other States, but to use the mails of the United States to further their unlawful business, thereby avoiding liability to arrest and prosecution; and

"Whereas concerns operating in this manner as a rule are totally irresponsible, their policies being of no value; and

"Whereas the offense in the various States of operating unauthorized insurance is only a misdemeanor and therefore not extraditable, rendering the State where the unauthorized insurance is written powerless to avenge the law where the operation has been transacted through the mails: Therefore, be it

"Resolved by the convention of insurance commissioners, That the committee on unauthorized insurance is hereby directed to draft a memorial to be presented on behalf of this convention to the Postmaster-General of the United States, acquainting him with the conditions and asking him to take cognizance of these matters whereby the United States mails are being used for base and fraudulent purposes and as a means of evading the criminal statutes of the various States.

"Be it further resolved, That the Postmaster-General be requested to deny the use of the mails to these pseudo insurance concerns where they seek to operate through the mails in the States wherein they have not procured license to do business from the proper authorities; or, if the Postmaster-General will not go so far, that he be requested at least to prohibit the mails to any pretending insurance company which is not authorized to do business by the proper insurance authorities of the State in which it has its domicile."

MEMORIAL TO CONGRESS.

The following is the memorial drafted by the convention, petitioning Congress to take cognizance of the situation and grant the desired relief:

To the Congress of the United States, Washington, D. C., greeting:

The national convention of insurance commissioners now in session at Columbus, Ohio, has the honor to address you for the purpose of respectfully and earnestly directing your attention to a serious condition of affairs which the members of this convention in their various jurisdictions are powerless to remedy, and from which substantial relief can only be obtained through enactment of amendments to the present postal laws.

We respectfully represent that to the best of our knowledge, information, and belief the United States mails are being used for fradulent and nefarious purposes by certain concerns styling themselves "insurance companies," and seeking by correspondence and advertising matter sent through the mails to obtain money for so-called fire-insurance policies, these policies being in most instances entirely worthless. None of the concerns in question is authorized to transact business by the authority of any State in the Union. They evade the laws of the States of their domicile by writing no business therein, and evade liability to arrest and prosecution in other States by operating entirely through the medium of the mails.

We respectfully urge that Congress will take cognizance of these matters to the end that proper laws may be passed to meet the serious situation.

Respectfully,

NATIONAL INSURANCE COMMISSIONERS' CONVENTION.

Purposes of the bill presented (by Mr. Folk):

This bill will accomplish the relief sought for. The relief proposed by this bill can only come through the National Congress. The public at large in this country is being imposed upon to a greater extent by unworthy concerns claiming to be insurance companies than by any other class of frauds. This imposition is only made possible by the use of the United States mails.

The various States through their legislatures have proceeded as far as possible to protect their people from these insurance impositions. They have set up a prudent standard of safety with which every company must comply before it can obtain license to legally transact business in the States. They have enacted laws making it a misdemeanor for any concern to operate the business of insurance in their boundaries without proper license to do so, and making it a misdemeanor for any agent to represent any insurance concern not properly authorized. These efforts on the part of the States to protect their people from fraud, these laws designed to promote the public welfare and punish crime, are openly and flagrantly defied and evaded and set at naught through the medium and by the aid of the mails of the United States.

The favorite method of evasion is this: An underground or wildcat insurance concern will obtain a charter in one State, establish an office in another, and then proceed to circularize through the mails the people of the remaining States, claiming large amounts of assets and offering to write insurance at very low rates. Its victims only discover the imposition when a fire occurs. Great care and caution is exercised by the concern that no policy is solicited or written in the State of its headquarters.

The United States Government owes it to its people to withhold the privilege of the mails from such concerns, which at one and the same time use the mails for the purpose of defying the statutes of the various States and defrauding the general public. There are doubtless some unauthorized insurance concerns which are to a more or less extent responsible for their contracts, but these are the exceptions. Legislation to be wise must be made to apply to the general run of things; it should not permit abuses in order to protect the exceptions. No company which is responsible for its contracts will have any difficulty in obtaining authority from its home State

An insurance contract is a delicate one, and is essentially based on confidence. It is a promise on the part of the insurance company to perform some act based on a future contingency. The contract holder must have confidence, not only in the good intentions, but in the absolute financial ability of the company to carry out the contract, otherwise there would be no contract. Experience demonstrates that a large portion of the public, being itself honest, presumes the balance of the world to be so, and is prone to accept in good faith statements that are made. Specious pretense is frequently taken for true value and fact.

It is the policy of the Government, both Federal and State, to enact stringent laws against fraud of any character and against any method of imposition which is designed to inspire confidence for the purpose of securing money without giving adequate return. An imposition upon confidence is at all times a reprehensible, grievous offense against law and morality, but in the case of a bogus insurance contract it is not only this, but it is a most cruel crime. The revelation of the fraud comes at the time of disaster. The holder of a bogus insurance contract, when his house is swept away by fire, finds that the protection for which he has been paying is a myth, and that he has not only lost the money that he had paid for it, but that it has been the means of keeping him from taking real insurance.

How to reach the crime committed by the company under present conditions is a difficult problem. The company, in case of loss, is, of course, in another State; the crime of operating unauthorized insurance is only a misdemeanor; it is not extraditable. If the company should be indicted for fraud it can easily claim noncompliance with some condition of the contract, or set up its good intentions to pay at the time of writing the contract.

The various States, for the protection of their people, have insurance departments charged with the duty of granting license to any company that comes up to the standard of safety set by the statutes, and charging these departments further with the duty of holding every licensed company to a strict accountability for its contracts. The wisdom of this policy on the part of the States is very manifest. When a man makes a contract of any sort with his neighbor, he has means of knowing the ability of the neighbor to keep his contract.

The insurance company is usually remote from the contract holder, hence the contract holder has no means within himself of knowing the ability of the company to keep its contracts. Recognizing the vital importance of protecting the public, the policy of State supervision was inaugurated. It is easy for the citizen to ascertain whether the company which is seeking his business is licensed in his State, and if he finds it is licensed, that fact should be an evidence to him that the company is good for its contracts. He can obtain also from the insurance department any detailed information concerning the financial condition of any licensed company.

The only way, however, in which a State insurance department can protect its people from unauthorized companies is to advise them against such companies where possible, and to cause the arrest of any agent found in the State representing any such company. But it is totally impossible for the insurance department of any State to save the public from imposition from this quarter, except in isolated cases. The only remedy, the only relief, lies in the enactment of some legislation like this, taking away the privilege of using the mails to those unworthy concerns who are employing that privilege in most cases for nefarious and reprehensible purposes.

READ G. FOLK,
Insurance Commissioner of the State of Tennessee.

Mr. Folk's bill is as follows:

A bill to amend "An act to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes relating to lotteries, and for other purposes," so as to apply the provisions of the act to persons or concerns seeking to do the business of fire, life, and other insurance without proper authority.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3894 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3894. No letter, postal card, or circular concerning any lottery, so-called gift concert, or similar enterprise offering prizes dependent upon lot or chance, or concerning schemes devised for the purpose of obtaining money or property under false pretenses, or concerning the business of fire, life, or other insurance conducted by any person or concern without having previously complied with the laws or regulations or ordinances of the State in which such insurance business is domiciled, or of the State in which it has its headquarters, and no list of the drawings at any lottery or similar scheme, and no lottery ticket or part thereof, and no check, draft, bill, money, postal note, or money order for the purchase of any ticket, tickets, or part thereof, or of any share or any chance in any such lottery or gift enterprise, shall be carried in the mail or delivered at or through any post-office or branch thereof, or by any letter carrier; nor shall any newspaper, circular, pamphlet, or publication of any kind containing any advertisement of any lottery or gift enterprise of any kind offering prizes dependent upon lot or chance, or containing any list of prizes awarded at the drawings of any such lottery or gift enterprise, whether said list is of any part or of all of the drawings, be carried in the mail or delivered by any postmaster or letter carrier.

"Any person who shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited, or who shall knowingly send or cause to be sent, anything to be conveyed or delivered by mail in violation of this section, or who shall knowingly cause to be delivered by mail anything herein forbidden to be carried by mail, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, for each offense.

"Any person violating any of the provisions of this section may be proceeded against by information or indictment, and tried and punished, either in the district at which the unlawful publication was mailed or to which it is carried by mail for delivery according to the direction thereon, or at which it is caused to be delivered by mail to the person to whom it is addressed."

SEC. 2. That section 3929 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3929. The Postmaster-General may, upon evidence satisfactory to him that any person or company is engaged in conducting any lottery, gift enterprise, or scheme for the distribution of money or of any real or personal property by lot, chance, or drawing of any kind; or that any person or company is conducting any other scheme or device for obtaining money or property of any kind through the mails by means of false or fraudulent pretenses, representations, or promises; or that any person or company is conducting the business of fire, life, or other insurance without having previously complied with the laws or regulations or ordinances of the State in which the business is domiciled, or in which it has its headquarters, instruct postmasters at any post-office at which letters or other mail matter arrives directed to any such person or company, or to the agent or representative of any such person or company, whether such agent or representative is acting as an individual or as a firm, bank, corporation, or association of any kind, to return all such letters or other mail matter to the postmaster at the office at which they were originally mailed, with the word 'Fraudulent' plainly written or stamped upon the outside thereof; and all such letters or other mail matter so returned to such postmasters shall be by them returned to the writers thereof, under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe.

"But nothing contained in this section shall be so construed as to authorize any postmaster or other person to open any letter not addressed to himself. The public advertisement by such person or company so conducting such lottery, gift enterprise, scheme, or device, that remittances for the same may be made by registered letters to any other person, firm, bank, or corporation, or association named therein, shall be held to be prima facie evidence of the existence of said agency by all the parties named therein; but the Postmaster-General shall not be precluded from ascertaining the existence of such agency in any other legal way satisfactory to himself."

SEC. 3. That section 4041 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4041. The Postmaster-General may, upon evidence satisfactory to him that any person or company is engaged in conducting any lottery, gift enterprise, or scheme for the distribution of money or of any real or personal property by lot, chance, or drawing of any kind, or that any person or company is conducting any other scheme for obtaining money or property of any kind through the mails by means of false or fraudulent pretenses, representations, or promises, or that any person or company is conducting the business of fire, life, or other insurance without having previously complied with the laws or regulations or ordinances of the State in which such business is domiciled, or of the State in which such person or company has his or its headquarters, forbid the payment by any postmaster to said person or company of any postal money orders drawn to his or its order, or in his or its favor, or the agent of any such person or company, whether such agent is acting as an individual or as a firm, bank, corporation, or association of any kind, and may provide by regulation for the return to the remitters of the sums named in such money orders. But this shall not authorize any person to open any letter not addressed to himself.

"The public advertisement by such person or company so conducting any such lottery, gift, enterprise, scheme or advice, that remittances for the same may be made by means of postal money orders to any other person, firm, bank, corporation, or association named therein shall be held to be prima facie evidence of the existence of said agency by all the parties named therein; but the Postmaster-General shall not be precluded from ascertaining the existence of such agency in any other legal way."

SEC. 4. That the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the suppression of the lottery traffic through national and interstate commerce and the postal service, subject to the jurisdiction and laws of the United States," are hereby extended and made applicable to this act.

Monopoly and Trusts—Tariff on Coal.

SPEECH
OF
HON. JOSEPH B. CROWLEY,
OF ILLINOIS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Wednesday, January 14, 1903,
On the bill (H. R. 16649) to provide a rebate of duties on coal.

Mr. CROWLEY said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The pending bill, while impotent and insufficient in its scope and purpose, is a reluctant concession wrung from the Republican party in its hour of terror as it faces the indignant, outraged, and freezing American public. To place coal on the free list for a period of one year and pay out of the public Treasury a rebate equal to the amount of the tariff tax on all coal imported, is a mockery on your professed humanity, a travesty on justice, and an insult to the intelligence of the American people. Had the policy of the Republican party been in harmony with its professions you would have placed coal on the free list as soon as this session of Congress convened. After a month and a half of hesitation, halting, and inaction, when the people are suffering in midwinter's grasp and it is too late for this legislation to result in any practical benefit or any material reduction in the price of the commodity, you rush into the Committee of the Whole House with a subterfuge and excuse for a remedy, when the situation demands heroic and humanitarian treatment.

The Republican party is responsible, both directly and indirectly, for the present coal famine. It is directly responsible, through its system of trust-breeding tariffs, for the existence of the "coal trust." It is indirectly responsible for the refusal of its Attorney-General to proceed both civilly and criminally against this monstrous and soulless "coal combine" for the violation of Federal statutes. It has been demonstrated by actual facts, and conceded by many of the most eminent Republican leaders that the Republican tariff laws are abnormal in their extortions and a menace to the peace and prosperity of the wealth producers of our land.

I do not propose to frighten you as the people have done, by their demands for justice, neither do I intend to annoy you with the true theories of economics as advocated by the Democratic party, but I do call to witness against your present policy distinguished members or your own political household. If you deny their statements, you will convict yourselves of false pretenses and hypocrisy to the people.

I will commence with the distinguished chairman of your Congressional committee:

Shall we continue a tariff on articles that yield no revenues, need no protection, and are articles of export? How can such a policy be defended? It simply inures to the benefit of those who secure control of any such commodity, since by its aid they can fix exorbitant prices in the domestic market. (Congressman BABCOCK.)

I tell you, if we Republicans do not take the matter in hand and adjust our tariff to prevent inequalities and abuses, we shall not have the opportunity. (Mr. EUGENE FOSS, the Republican candidate for Congress in the Eleventh Massachusetts district.)

The people who cast the votes have the power to enforce the order that they be protected against foreign business rivals, whom they are already underselling in the foreign market. And every proof of the misapplication of the high-tariff system, such as Mr. Schwab furnishes, will incite the voters to exercise their authority at the polls. (Ex-Postmaster-General Wanamaker.)

There seems to be but one way to deal with the trusts, and that involves adjustments of the tariff on the products of the trusts. (Secretary of War Root.)

Ex-United States Senator Washburn, of Minnesota, a Republican, in an interview published in the New York Tribune, September 11, 1899, says:

"There is one thing that greatly disturbs me. The Republican party, whether justly or unjustly, is associated with trusts in the minds of the masses. As a party we have reached the crisis where we have got to call a halt. The Republican party has got to disconnect itself from the trusts. It has got to legislate them. The Republicans in Congress will have to examine the subject thoroughly, and whenever they find a trust is depending for its exorbitant profits largely upon protective duties it will be the duty of Republican Congressmen and Senators to remove the duties at once. This should be done with the duty on steel rails and tin plate."

John Sherman, ex-Secretary of the Treasury and United States Senator, said:

"Every advance toward a free exchange of commodities is an advance in civilization; every obstruction to a free exchange is born of the narrow despotic spirit which planted castles upon the Rhine to plunder peaceful commerce; every obstruction to commerce is a tax upon consumption; every facility to a free exchange cheapens commodities, increases trade and production, and promotes civilization. Nothing is worse than sectionalism within a nation, and nothing is better for the peace of nations than unrestricted freedom of commerce and intercourse with each other.

"The primary object of a protective tariff is to invite the fullest competition by individuals and corporations in domestic productions. If such individuals or corporations combine to advance the price of the domestic product, and to prevent the free result of open and fair competition, I would, without a moment's hesitation, reduce the duties on foreign goods competing with them in order to break down the combination. Whenever this free competition is evaded or avoided by combinations or corporations, the duty should be reduced and foreign competition promptly invited."

We must not repose in fancied security that we can forever sell everything and buy little or nothing. * * * The period of exclusiveness is past. Commercial wars are unprofitable. * * * If perchance some of our tariffs are no longer needed for revenue or to encourage and protect our industries at home, why should they not be employed to extend and promote our markets abroad? (President McKinley in his last speech at Buffalo.)

The protective tariff is the parent of conditions that make it profitable for capital to combine. (Secretary Shaw.)

Henry Clay, who is regarded as the father of the protective system of this country, said in 1833:

"The theory of protection supposes that after a certain time the protected manufacturers will have acquired such strength and protection as will enable them subsequently unaided to stand against foreign competition."

Again in 1840, he said:

"No one, Mr. President, in the commencement of the protective policy ever supposed that it was to be perpetual."

Again in 1843, he said:

"My opinion that there is no danger hereafter of a high tariff is founded on the gratifying fact that our manufacturers have now taken a deep root. In their infancy, they needed a greater measure of protection, but as they grow and advance they acquire strength and stability, and consequently will require less protection. Even now, some branches of them are able to maintain in distant markets successful competition with rival foreign manufacturers."

I wish to add here some testimony taken before the Industrial Commission.

[Extract from the testimony of Henry O. Havemeyer before the United States Industrial Commission.]

The mother of all trusts is the customs tariff bill. The existing bill and the preceding ones have been the occasion of the formation of all the large trusts, with very few exceptions, inasmuch as they provide for an inordinate protection to all the interests of the country, sugar refining excepted. Economic advantages incident to the consolidation of large interests in the same line of business are a great incentive to their formation, but these bear a very insignificant proportion to the advantages granted in the way of protection under the customs tariff.

There probably is not an industry that requires a protection of more than 10 per cent ad valorem, and it is to obtain what is provided over such percentage in the tariff that leads to the formation of what are commonly spoken of as "trusts."

With a protection to an industry not exceeding 10 per cent all menace to the community from trusts would cease. This 10 per cent would represent the cost of production, and likewise act as a protection against surplus products of foreign countries being dumped into our local markets, thereby interfering with the regular and economic working of our industries. Any advantage that might then accrue to such combinations they would be fully entitled to, and the public would not be damaged thereby, as any expansion of price would be met by foreign competition and relief.

The following is an extract from Henry O. Havemeyer's testimony before the United States Industrial Commission:

Q. (By Mr. Farquhar.) Do you take into account, as an American (you say you are a protectionist), whatever may be your views of protection, that in making the tariff bills in this country or in making any impost legislation we have to take into consideration two great facts: first, the wages paid to American workmen, and, secondly, the interest on American money? Do you know of any industry in this country that 10 per cent ad valorem ever created—any one—even to the making of tacks?

A. Shall I be perfectly frank, anyway?

Q. Yes.

A. How about steel rails? Steel rails were exported at the time the steel schedule was under discussion; they were being sent to England and Scotland. They can be produced for $15 a ton: now the reason they are worth $24 a ton is because the people under the tariff are mulcted for the difference. I am not talking about things that are ancient history; I am talking about things that exist. I am not talking as to whether 100 per cent was necessary or not; I am talking about the effect of the tariff to-day, which is the mother of these trusts which are mulcting the people, and there is not a line of it free from this abuse to-day.

I offer the following extract from the sworn testimony of Herman B. Butler, a leading steel manufacturer, before the United States Industrial Commission, for the edification of those strangely constituted Republicans who think that our manufacturers will export $43,000,000 worth of steel in a single year at a loss on every ton:

Q. This very statement that you have made to the effect that American goods are often sold abroad cheaper than they are sold in the United States has been given as an argument in favor of the reduction of the tariff. Do you think it is an argument in favor of the removal of the tariff?

A. Well, if I were a manufacturer I should say that it was not a sufficient argument, but if I was a taxpayer I should say it was.

Charles M. Schwab, president of the steel trust, testified before the United States Industrial Commission that export prices were lower than domestic prices on the products of the steel trust. The following is a verbatim extract from the records of the Commission:

Q. (By Mr. Jenks.) I should like to go back for a moment to the question of lower export prices. You said that last year the export price was considerably lower than the price in the United States. Would you give us definite figures?

A. I have not them at hand, but it would vary with each article.

Q. Suppose you take the case of steel rails; could you give us about the difference between export and home prices?

A. I would have to make a guess. I do not know definitely. The export price was about $23 per ton.

Q. And the price here?

A. Was $26 and $28 per ton.

Q. At the same time?

A. At the same time.

When it is remembered that the freight rate between Pittsburg and Liverpool is approximately $5 per ton, and that the $23 price in England includes the freight—in other words that the steel trust pays that freight to Liverpool and then sells it at $23 per ton, it will be evident to what extent the people are being robbed through the agency of a trust-making tariff.

The steel trust people are sure to take care of themselves, as is shown by the following extract from the evidence of Mr. Schwab, president of the steel trust, before the United States Industrial Commission:

Q. Is there any foreign tariff that stands in the way of the development of your business?

A. Yes, indeed; you are quite right about that. If we could succeed in getting the tariff off in Germany and France and Austria it would help us very much.

Q. Does not the same reasoning apply to our tariff as it comes in contact with the products of foreign steel mills?

A. I think so, but I think we are looking out for ourselves first.

Garfield announced the doctrine of his party to be "protective tariff that leads to ultimate free trade." His latter-day followers have revised that doctrine so as to make it more up to date. It now is "protective tariff that leads to big campaign contributions on the part of the trusts."

Senator FORAKER, in his speech at Akron, Ohio, last fall, conceded that "to admit duty free all articles the like of which are produced in this country would probably stop the trusts."

We favor any modification of the tariff schedules as will prevent their affording shelter to monopoly. (Iowa Republican platform.)

We favor such revision of the tariff as will place upon the free list every article and product controlled by any monopoly. (Idaho Republican platform.)

It must be confessed that in many instances protection has bee n made wholly superfluous so far as the interests of industry are concerned and oppressive so far as the people are concerned. (Baltimore American (Rep.).)

It is a notorious fact that some of the tariff schedules do afford shelter to monopoly; that is, they permit certain trusts or combines to exact from domestic consumers unreasonably high prices for their products—prices higher than could be exacted if the tariff afforded no more protection than is necessary to enable the American producers to compete on even terms with their foreign rivals. (Chicago Tribune (Rep.).)

The coal trust of Pennsylvania is perfectly protected by the tariff, and its cruel rapacity is only one more factor in arousing all over this country a demand for a sensible revision of the tariff, which, as the American has ably pointed out in its editorial columns, the Republican party will be unwise, indeed, to ignore. (Baltimore American (Rep.).)

It was General GROSVENOR, "the father of all political fables," who said in the course of a tariff debate:

Oh, what a tangled web we weave
When first we practice to deceive.

The Republican party has woven this web around itself while practicing to deceive the people on the tariff question, and it has awakened to that fact through the schisms within its own ranks.

Mr. Speaker, these are only a few quotations from unquestioned Republican authority, but they all go to prove that the theory of protection as practiced by the Republican party has culminated in a gigantic piece of legislative machinery that takes the wealth of the nation from the people to whom it belongs, and transfers it to the favored few, who control and dominate the Republican party and through it the Government.

In 1900 the Philadelphia Times published an article penned by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], that expresses my conception of the dangers that threaten our free institutions by the encroachments of these gigantic combinations of centralized greed. The article reads in part as follows:

These gigantic combinations constitute, in my judgment, the greatest menace at the present time to our democratic institutions. They control the supply, monopolize the product, and dictate the price of every necessity of life. They force out of legitimate employment thousands and thousands of honest toilers. They enhance prices, reduce wages, and write the terms of their own contracts. They paralyze opportunities, assassinate labor, and hold the consumers of our country in their monopolistic grasp. They levy tribute on every man, woman, and child in the Republic. They blight the poor man's home, darken the hearthside of his children, and cloud the star of youth's legitimate hope.

They control legislation, escape taxation, and evade the just burdens of government, while their agents construct and maintain tariffs to suit their selfish ends and greedy purposes. They imperil trade, stagnate industry, regulate foreign and interstate commerce, declare quarterly dividends on watered stock, and make fortunes every year out of the people. Their tyrannical power, rapid growth, and centralization of wealth is the marvel of recent times and the saddest commentary on our legislative history. Prior to the civil war there was not a trust in the country, except the United States Bank trust, which Jackson killed, but to-day they practically own, run, and control the Government, and defy successful prosecution for violation of law. If their power of centralization is not speedily checked, and they go on for another quarter of a century as they have in the past few years, I believe our free institutions will be destroyed, and instead of a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people, we will have a Government of the trusts, by the trusts, and for the trusts.

The centralization of wealth in the hands of the few by the robbery of the many during the past quarter of a century has been simply enormous, and the facts and figures are appalling. Three-quarters of the entire wealth of our land appears to be concentrated in the hands of a very small minority of the people, and the number of persons constituting that minority grows smaller every year. The legislative schemes which have been favored for checking this growing centralization of wealth are generally the most elusive and the most impotent.

Impartial students of these startling facts can hardly escape the irresistible conclusion that a conspiracy exists, and has existed for some time, to convert the Government of the United States into a powerful oligarchy of wealth. The millionaires, the plutocrats, the trusts, the monopolies, and the syndicates seem to be supreme and legislate for their own interests. The yeomanry of our country will soon be reduced to a condition of industrial serfdom more pitiable than ever existed before in the history of the world.

The money power, the trusts, the syndicates, and the favored few of the land threaten the perpetuity of our free institutions by subsidizing the pulpit, buying the press, seating well-paid attorneys in legislative halls and courts of justice, stifling free speech and the right of lawful assembly, and stretching out their tentacles to the colleges to crush professors who have the courage to tell the truth.

Mr. Speaker, it is manifest that the coal trust and other trusts have more influence with the Attorney-General than the 99 per cent of the American people. This seems to be proven by the evidence taken before the Industrial Commission. The facts brought out in volume 19 of the Commission's report show beyond any question of doubt that a monopoly in anthracite coal does exist in violation of the laws of Pennsylvania as well as in violation of the Sherman antitrust act. These facts with other and definite evidence was placed in the hands of the Attorney-General by Hon. W. R. Hearst last October. Yet no steps have been taken by the Attorney-General to punish or bring to justice the criminals.

In 1901 Hon. H. B. Martin, secretary of the American Anti-Trust League, placed in the hands of Mr. Knox equally as strong evidence concerning the violations of law of the United States Steel Corporation, and after repeated efforts to have the Attorney-General proceed against the steel trust was finally informed by Mr. Knox that he "did not intend to take the case up." The facts in this and similar cases can be found in the speech of Hon. DUDLEY WOOTEN of Texas, printed in the RECORD of last July, and the speech of Senator TILLMAN, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the present month.

I will add here some more evidence corroborative of the facts I have stated above:

The evils of tariff-protected trusts are not entirely measured by the injury inflicted by artificially high prices, as many people assume. These evils extend into political and social life and even into our colleges.

The protective tariff is responsible for much of the corruption in politics. It is not by chance that Pennsylvania has been for thirty years the worst boss-ridden State in this country. The Camerons and QUAYS have political power and influence because they serve the protected trusts. It is not by chance that the few labor organizations inimical to the public welfare are centered in the highly protected industries of Pennsylvania. It is not by chance that a large portion of the workingmen employed by the protected trusts are ignorant immigrants working under conditions of semislavery. It is not by chance that there are so many millionaires in Congress to safeguard the protected industries. It is because the protected trusts have completely corrupted politics, and have sent their agents to Congress that the protected interests have for years dictated tariff legislation at Washington.

As Mr. Henry L. Nelson says, "Since 1875 Congress has not legislated on the tariff, it has simply affirmed or ratified the decrees of the beneficiaries of the tariff. These people have transformed the Government into a socialism, in which they are not merely the favored class, they constitute the only class." (Mr. Byron Holt in his testimony before the United States Industrial Commission.)

Nearly all of the information on this point which I have obtained during the last few years has been strictly confidential. In this way I learned a few days ago that tin plate is being extensively offered and in some instances has been sold to manufacturers of cans and packages, to be filled with products for export, at about $1 per box below the price to other manufacturers and consumers. I also learned last week, from an entirely reliable source, that steel rails were sold some three months ago to foreigners at less than $21 per ton. I could specify the exact price, names of both seller and buyer in an important recent transaction, but am not permitted to do so. These rails were sold with the provision that they were not to be used in the United States. That steel rails are sold for export at whatever the manufacturer can get above $20, and perhaps for considerable less if the time of delivery is remote enough, I do not doubt. The manufacturers' pool or selling agreement, under which rails are now sold for $28, is not effective on rails sold to foreigners or for export. The newspapers of a month or so ago contained the details of a sale of steel rails to an English firm for $15 per ton (allowing for freight) less than the price to Americans. The New York World of April 9, 1901, thus states the case:

"Mr. Charles Thulin, a Pennsylvania contractor, recently secured a contract to supply rails for Russia's great Siberian railway. He asked the leading steel trust companies here for bids. They all asked him about $35 per ton, with freight to be added. Mr. Thulin went over to England, sublet his contract to an English firm, and one of the same companies that had asked him $35 plus freight here sold the rails at $24 a ton delivered in England to the English subcontractor."

The extent to which goods are sold cheaper for export than in the home market is not known to most people, because the trusts—and protected trusts are the worst offenders—take pains to conceal export prices and practically pledge all parties concerned to keep all such knowledge from reaching the public.

"After having investigated this subject for more than ten years, I have reached the conclusion that practically all of our manufactured products are sold to foreigners for less than to Americans. The minimum difference is about 10 per cent. The average difference in price is probably 20 per cent and on our really protected products above 25 per cent. Often we who pay the tariff taxes devoted to nourishing these 'infant industries' must pay 50 to 100 per cent more for the products of these coddled industries than is paid by foreigners who do not pay our nursing taxes. Thus during the two years ending December 31, 1900, we exported 136,000,000 pounds of wire nails. Had these nails been sold in this country they would have brought $3,650,000, according to the average price of 2.68 cents per pound given in the Iron Age of January 3, 1901. The Government's statistics tell us that the foreigners paid $3,220,000, or an average of 2.44 cents per pound. As nails were being sold for export in December, 1899, at $2.14, when they were being sold here for $3.53 per keg, the highest price within ten years, it is probable that the average export price for 1899 and 1900 was about 2 cents per pound; that is, our petted steel and wire trust charged us about $1,000,000 more than they charged foreigners for the same quantity of nails in these two years." (Byron Holt in his testimony before the United States Industrial Commission.)

Before leaving this great steel trust, I wish to quote a part of the letter of F. A. Wilmot, president of the Wilmot & Hobbs Manufacturing Company, Bridgeport, Conn., in the Iron Age of May 2, 1901:

TO THE EDITOR: Noticing that you have given considerable prominence in recent issues to the organization of the Manufacturers' Association of Bridgeport, and to the end that the manufacturers' associations of other cities and other manufacturers in other cities where manufacturers' associations are in process of formation or are contemplated, we would suggest that you give due prominence to the position which these manufacturing associations in the various cities, particularly along the Atlantic seaboard and Canadian border, and especially in New England, are taking as regards their present handicap in the cost of raw material, such as coal, coke, iron ore, pig iron, steel ingots and billets, and their desire to have these commodities placed by Congress immediately upon the free list. They believe that as these materials are produced cheaper in this country than in any other portion of the world and are sold abroad at lower prices than along the seaboard and Canadian border, the industries which produce them are no longer infant and do not need protection.

They believe that protection, so called, is but another term for government assistance to monopolies and trusts. This position the Government, as it now exists, can ill afford to assume, nor can it allow the people to feel that it is drifting into such position where it is so working hand in hand with gigantic trusts; for when the people realize such to be the condition they will undoubtedly rise in their might and by their votes change the conditions and government which permits such conditions. * * * It is to be hoped that the Government of the United States will appreciate the position and make such changes in tariff regulations or duties from time to time as will result in putting upon the free list such commodities as do not further need protection on the score of their being infant industries.

Testimony of George H. Mayer, assistant manager glass department of the firm of John Lucas & Co., of Philadelphia, before the United States Industrial Commission, December 20, 1900:

Q. Does it not seem to you that under the provisions of the laws of the United States, which you have heard read here, you have a speedy and effective and inexpensive remedy against their alleged abuses?

A. I think that has been brought forth in the testimony of the previous witness. But at the same time the cause for the evil exists and will exist whether we should obtain a speedy remedy from any Federal court or not. It remains in the form of an oppressive, exorbitant tariff, of which the manufacturers are taking an undue advantage. The tariff, as I understand it, is primarily for the purpose of protecting the American industries and propagating them, and at the same time for the protection of the workingman against the low wages in Europe. But, as I have stated before, I have not heard or I have not known of any increase given in the wages to the workingmen by the plate-glass manufacturers here, and we do know to a certainty that they have increased the price to the consumer 150 per cent.

Testimony of Mr. Henry Lamb before the United States Industrial Commission:

I should say the trust in general, outside of the tariff trust, takes this position: "We are rendering a service better than anybody else can render it."

The position of the tariff trust seems to me to be this: "Nobody shall render this service but ourselves; whether it can be rendered better by anybody else or not, nobody else shall render it." That, I should say, is the broad distinction between trusts in general and the tariff trusts.

I ought to further say that I have no accusations to bring against specific tariff trusts; that my relations with them are personally pleasant in several lines of business. I must myself plead guilty to being in a small degree a stockholder in some of them; but what I do desire is to prevent the United States Government from aiding them in obstructing service, for that is what they do. It is evident that if somebody else can render services cheaper than these tariff trusts are rendering it, and nothing in the world but the tariff prevents that service being rendered more cheaply, then the service is obstructed.

The bad faith of the Republicans in the Fifty-sixth Congress, when they pigeonholed their own antitrust bill in the Senate, is too well known to need discussion at this time. But within less than a year they voted against their present professions. It happened in this way: The permanent census bill was under consideration in the Senate on the 15th of last February, when Senator DUBOIS, of Idaho, offered an amendment to the bill providing a so-called remedy for the trust, in direct accord with the recommendation of the President in his message to Congress. In offering the amendment, Senator DUBOIS said:

I am not making an indiscriminate attack on the trusts. My amendment simply carries out fully the suggestion of President Roosevelt, which is that the utmost publicity shall be given to the trusts.

When the vote was taken on the amendment the Republican Senators voted against it to a man.

When the constitutional amendment fake was presented by the Republicans for campaign purposes in the closing days of the Fifty-sixth Congress, the Washington Post commented editorially as follows:

The antitrust amendment device is too shallow to deceive anybody with sense enough to decline an invitation to buy a gold brick or to go out as a bag holder on a snipe-hunting expedition, and by supporting this constitutional amendment Democrats would have deliberately connived at the permanent retirement of the trust issue.

And at the same time the New York Sun took occasion to say:

This is the most dishonest, and therefore the most disreputable, piece of work achieved during the present session by the leaders of the Republican policy in the House. The dishonesty of the performance lies in the fact that there was no expectation on the part of the author of this resolution or of the Republicans of the Judiciary Committee who favorably reported it, or of the Republicans of the House who were willing to vote for it, that as the proposed sixteenth amendment it will ever amount to more than a campaign trick of the cheapest and unworthiest kind.

These are statements from newspapers that are anything but Democratic.

That the Republican party is systematically debasing labor and exalting wealth is proven by a glance at the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 2, 1900, when the Littlefield antitrust bill was pending. On that day, as recorded by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on page 6994, the Democratic minority introduced the following amendment to the Littlefield antitrust bill:

Nothing in this act shall be so constituted as to apply to trade unions or other labor organizations organized for the purpose of regulating wages, hours of labor, or other conditions under which labor is to be performed.

A yea-and-nay vote was taken on the amendment at the request of Hon. JAMES D. RICHARDSON, the Democratic leader in the House, who voted for the amendment. On the other hand, the nay vote shows that the Hon. CHARLES E. LITTLEFIELD, who framed the antitrust bill, voted against the amendment. His bill was so framed as to include the labor organizations in the list of "unlawful combinations." Representative CANNON, the next Speaker of the House, voted against the amendment, too, as did Congressmen Aldrich, ALLEN of Maine, Governor-elect Bailey of Kansas, CALDERHEAD, HITT of Illinois, and LONG of Kansas, all Republican leaders of more or less prominence. When Republican leaders will vote to make labor organizations unlawful, does it look as if the Republican party is the friend of labor?

Mr. Speaker, it is evident from the legislative deeds of the Republican party that the organization has degenerated into a mere registering machine to carry out the will of the trusts—its masters. Its platform pledges and political promises are but thinly veiled statements to delude the people. This is admitted by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the present House:

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] declares that the declarations of the Republican platform do not mean anything. (FRANCIS W. CUSHMAN (Republican) in the House of Representatives April 17, 1902.)

Mr. PAYNE certainly knew what he was talking about.

For thirteen long years the Republicans have been telling the country what they were going to do to the trusts. But the unsympathetic, cold-hearted type of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is full of empty words that have not been "backed up by deeds." The inclination of their tongues in one direction and the backpeddling of their promises in the opposite direction is a political paradox that would be amusing if its effect on the people was not so serious.

In conclusion, I desire to say that in my opinion the coal strike could have been prevented and the coal famine avoided had the Republican party not been owned body and soul by—

The corporation lords, who mock
The forms the law allows,
And know the way to water stock
With sweat of others' brows.

At the dawn of the present century it is manifest that the representatives of this "hierarchy of infernal splendor" sit in high places of the Government, with the dollar mark as their symbol of power, and instruct the Attorney-General how to violate his oath of office and defeat the ends of justice.

Rebate on Coal.

SPEECH
OF
HON. FREDERICK J. KERN,
OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, January 14, 1903,

On the bill (H. R. 16649) to provide for a rebate of duties on coal.

Mr. KERN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: It is proposed in the pending measure to suspend the tariff duty on coal for the period of one year. The Dingley tariff act, which is the tariff law now in force, fixed the rate of duty at 67 cents a ton on all coal imported into the United States. The bill before the House and now under consideration proposes to put coal on the free list and to admit it from abroad without obstructing its influx by the artificial barrier afforded by so-called protective tariff regulations. The pending bill is perhaps the shortest measure which this Congress, in all of its deliberations, has considered. Exclusive of the enacting clause, it is expressed in an aggregate of less than sixty words. Yet I believe that it is a measure far-reaching in its consequences and prophetic in its trend.

The bill is as a matter of course fathered by the majority party in this House. The most striking feature in it is the fact that it is diametrically opposed to all of the declared policies of the Republican party on the tariff question. The song has been dinned into our ears from our earliest childhood up to this time that the so-called protective tariff is designed to raise wages, and that it is maintained for the purpose of enlarging the incomes of the laboring men employed in the industry which any particular item in the schedule affects. The protectionist leaders do not seem to fear, however, that the removal of the duty on coal will affect deleteriously the wages of the men who are employed in the coal-producing industry. The miners in the eastern part of this country are dissatisfied with the wages which they are now receiving. The conditions of employment under which they are working and earning their daily bread have engendered discontent of the bitterest sort among them.

They have manifested their dissatisfaction with prevailing conditions by engaging in one of the most momentous and costly labor strikes of the century. Necessarily they endured the greatest hardships themselves during the time the strike lasted. No disturbance of the magnitude and persistence of the Pennsylvania strike can spring from any but aggravated causes. That the conditions in the mining industry, so far as the physical labor in it is concerned, in the eastern section of this country are deplorable in the extreme is a fact which the country well knows and which requires no elaboration here. Surely if a protective tariff raises wages the tariff on coal is a duty which ought not to be removed, and if it ought to be changed at all at this time, it ought to be raised. It is therefore not unreasonable to say that the most inconsistent act which the Republican party has ever committed it will commit when, through its instrumentality, this duty is removed.

Furthermore, the ostensible purpose for removing this duty is to benefit the consumer. Under these two startling admissions it seems clear to me, Mr. Speaker, that the protective theory falls flat to the ground and that all of the ingenious arguments which have hitherto served to sustain it and to delude the people on this live question are irrevocably refuted by its champions and friends. If the removal of the tariff duty on coal will benefit the consumer then the repeal of the sugar tariff and of the iron tariff and of the tin tariff and of the barbed-wire tariff and of the machinery tariff and of every other tariff will produce an identical result.

By way of evading the consequences of the deductions which are inevitable the distinguished gentleman of Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] adroitly resorts to an expedient which, while it is perhaps not so damaging to his hobby as candor and fair dealing would be, may serve its purpose with the unthinking, and certainly is ingenious enough in its way. The resourceful chairman of the Committee on Rules, speaking deliberately and with forethought, in opening this debate made the following statement:

Now, I want to say here and now, speaking for myself, that I do not believe that this legislation will introduce into the market an additional pound of coal. I do not believe that any coal will be imported that would not have been imported without the passage of this bill. I do not believe that it will have any appreciable effect upon the price of coal. I do not believe that any legislation can affect the greed and avarice of the cormorants who are taking advantage of the present condition to oppress people already oppressed. But it will do one thing—it will satisfy the great public that believes that Congress can do something, and it will show the disposition of Congress to do everything that it can do to alleviate this distress.

According to this language the proposed legislation is, plainly speaking, a transparent humbug. No relief for the people suffering from the coal famine is expected to follow its enactment into law. The people look to Congress for relief from a distressing situation. Congress will act; yet the thing that Congress will do will not give to the people the relief which they are seeking.

This is a humiliating confession, humiliating as it is candidly made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, of the utter incompetency of the majority party to deal effectually with the vital problem of the hour, of its hopeless impotency in the face of an acute disease in the body politic developed to the highest danger point, to apply any remedy whatever which promises even the slightest relief from prevalent distress. The gentlemen on the other side frankly confess that there is woeful suffering spread throughout the length and breadth of the land on account of the fuel famine.

People by the hundreds are dying every day in our country for want of sufficient fuel to keep them warm. They are freezing to death. In a land where nature has provided an overabundance of fuel they are dying from exposure to the elements. The aged and the little children, who should be the first objects of our especial care and deepest solicitude, are dropping away first. Among them the death rate is the highest and the greatest. Hundreds of thousands more who will escape immediate death are contracting maladies which neither time nor science will conquer. The conditions are deplorable and the prospect is appalling to contemplate.

The pitiful cry for relief has gone up. The wail of distress has penetrated the halls of Congress, and it has reached the ears of the chosen representatives of a sovereign people. Congress has heard the imploring clamor for pressing relief, but we, who are here serving the people as their representatives, are told in cold-blooded fashion that Congress will have completely exhausted its powers in the premises when it will have removed the duty on coal. Is this not an admission, Mr. Speaker, that Congress brought on this crisis and that the responsibility for its ravages rests upon the head of Congress by this body ever having imposed this duty?

But this is the conclusion which the gentleman from Pennsylvania tries to escape when he gives it as his deliberate opinion, and the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means from New York [Mr. PAYNE] supports him in that opinion when he plainly states that the removal of the duty on coal will not relieve in the slightest degree the distressing situation. This proposed legislation is, then, confessedly, a mere subterfuge designed to fool and deceive the people, brazenly admitted to be so by the acknowledged leaders of the majority party in this House. The people are clamoring for bread, Mr. Speaker, and you are offering them a stone in lieu of it. Is this not a case of willful trifling with the people who elected you?

You confess that you are trying to delude them. The excuse you offer is that you are exhausting the power of Congress to do something in the premises, yet you admit that that which you are trying to do is thoroughly impractical and will be wholly fruitless in results.

Rest assured, however, that the attempt that you are making to deceive the populace will not succeed. The people fully understand this proposed legislation in all of its bearings. Their intelligence is alert, and their watchful eye is upon you. Yet you might as well make the additional confession that you well know that they have long since ceased to look to you for substantial relief in cases of distress arising from evils which are the outgrowth of social wrongs, tolerated only on account of their antiquity.

It is idle, Mr. Speaker, to try to shift the blame for the unfortunate condition with which the country is face to face on honest workingmen in Pennsylvania who struck for higher wages and better conditions of employment for the simple reason that their condition had become unbearable when they suspended toil. It is as foolish as it is wicked to blame these men for banding themselves together and forming an effectual organization. The avarice of the operators and their refusal to pay their men living wages and to concede them halfway decent and humane conditions of employment caused the Pennsylvania strike. The men organized under the first law of nature, which is the law of self-defense. They tried to do for themselves that which Congress and the State legislatures have persistently and stubbornly refused to do for them.

They organized in an effort to secure something like a fair division of the proceeds of their unremitting toil. They organized to build up the strength necessary to enable them to force lawmakers to do things for them in the name of justice, and the eternal right, which they refused to do voluntarily.

The responsibility for the prevailing coal famine in this country rests entirely with the combined and consolidated coal and railway monopoly. This combination must be broken up before permanent relief can be hoped for. You might as well try to obscure the light of the sun with a porous plaster as to try to injure or sunder this conspiracy of all-devouring monopolies, by the removal of the tariff duty on coal. That band of heartless brigands which is in control of these monopolies does not fear such a proposition. It does not care a snap of its fingers for it. It can well afford to laugh at the farcical proceeding.

Numerous monopolies need the protective tariff to insure them a continuation of life. They could not exist for a day without a high protective tariff. But the coal monopoly does not need the protective tariff to perpetuate its existence, nor to afford it immunity from interference and natural and wholesome competition in its criminal operations. All of the anthracite coal in the world is located in this country, and 95 per cent of that within the boundaries of the State of Pennsylvania.

The coal trust stands on firmer rock than that afforded by discriminative tariff duties. It has made itself by stealthy and steady strides the sole proprietor and the undisputed master of nature's bounties and gifts to all of God's children in so far as the base of its supply is involved. It absolutely owns and controls in its own name and holds a clear title to enough of the untouched coal deposits laid away in the bowels of the earth by the slow work of uncounted ages in the anthracite fields to reduce large numbers of the American people to the groveling level of abject dependency with regard to its needs for fuel.

This form of monopoly is ten thousand times worse and ten thousand times more vicious than any monopoly which the protective tariff has created or ever can create. To make the cinch complete and invulnerable, to make it a genuine rock-ribbed, lead-pipe cinch, the same combination of capitalists which holds almost absolutely the anthracite coal supply under its control possesses in addition the exclusive transportation facilities and has monopolized them also. This consolidation of plutocratic combines forms what is known as the "coal trust." It is the most perfect machine for robbing the people of their substance which satanic ingenuity has yet contrived. It is the most diabolical conspiracy for oppressing labor and appropriating the fruits of its toil which the world in the entire course of its existence has seen. Chattel slavery was child's play as compared with it.

This coal trust is arrogant, audacious, greedy, selfish, and corrupt to the core. It knows no law except that of self-interest. It sets in open defiance all rightly constituted authority. It ruthlessly throws all established and honorable standards to the ground. It steals not merely men's property without any compunctions of conscience whatever, but it destroys and murders their most sacred rights. The blood and muscle of children of tender age it neither hesitates nor scruples to coin into gold. The purity and the sanctity of the institution of government it holds in smiling contempt. It is thoroughly law defying, anarchistic in its bold manipulations. The political party that does its servile bidding gets its unqualified and substantial support. The politician who stoops to become its pliant tool, ever willing to obey its commands and never questioning them, is its statesman and its saint. Intrenched as it is in usurped power, it neither fears nor respects God nor man. It exercises its power with the arbitrariness of a despot.

I fully agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from New York that this combination will give us the "horse laugh" when we resort to no more drastic remedy than that proposed in the removal of the buncombe duty on coal to relieve the existing situation. But I do not believe in the plan to fool the people. I discountenance that plan and hammer upon it the stamp of my hearty disapproval and my profoundest contempt. I shall vote for the bill only because I believe it to be a move in the right direction. It wipes one stain from the statute books of the nation. At the same time I insist on the right to tell the people the unvarnished truth in the clearest light that it is given me to see concerning this attempted subterfuge.

If Congress is as impotent to deal with this question or with other vital questions as these statesmen tell us it is, then it is time for the people to learn that fact. I do not believe that it is. I believe that Congress and the Executive have full power under the Constitution to break up every monopoly that preys upon the people and robs them of their wealth. I believe that if existing laws had been rigorously enforced the present crisis would never have arisen to leave death and suffering in its train. If existing laws are insufficient to deal with the question it is the business of the President and his Attorney-General to let us know it, and it is our duty to deal with the situation in an effectual way and not to waste time and disseminate confusion in the further piling up of labeled humbugs.

Government is not merely a negative force. It has an affirmative and constructive character as well. If government is not a practical thing, clothed with a power to do things of practical value for the people, then it is a ridiculous travesty. It is simply a gigantic zero with the circumference wiped out. Furthermore, a government that will not protect the weak against the strong is in grave danger of sacrificing the respect of those who live under the folds of its flag. In the contempt thus bred the seeds of anarchy lie dormant and threaten at any time to shoot up their poisonous sprouts like mushrooms in a dark cellar. In my opinian the government should be strong enough and virile enough to protect society against the rich rascal as well as against the depredations of the poor thief.

By the weak I do not mean those alone who are infirm, old, feeble, or very young, or sick or maimed or deformed. The gobbling up of unjust privilege, the establishment of monopolies, the centralization of combined and consolidated wealth has secured terrible advantage for a small class of the predatory rich in our social organization. The amassing of wealth, as experience amply proves, is accompanied by the acquisition of undue political power. It is the duty of Congress and the legislatures to curb that and keep it within reasonable bounds. The strong rich man can abuse his superior strength as well as the strong man physically can, and he does it much oftener and with less respect for the feelings of his victims. He has formed the trusts, which are the blight, the curse, and the arch evil in this country to-day, and the trusts will destroy this Government, sure as death, if the Government does not destroy them or in some way strip them of their power for evil doing.

The blame for the prevailing coal famine is indiscriminately saddled on the unfortunate miners who struck for their just rights and dues in the anthracite coal fields of Pennsylvania last summer. That is an easy way out of a perplexing dilemma, and in this fact lies concealed the reason the dodging expedient finds such ready acceptance and so many adherents, both on this floor and by careless scribblers for the public press. Let us examine this convenient and seductive theory for a moment. The Associated Press reported 11 deaths outright from freezing in the city of Chicago last Monday. It reported, furthermore, that there were 200,000 persons in acute distress and in imminent danger on account of the coal famine in the same city. On the same page of the same sheet which contained these accounts the same concern reported the following from a reliable and official source:

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., January 12, 1903.

Adam Menche, president of the State Federation of Labor, was questioned to-night relative to a report from Chicago that the grand jury which is investigating the alleged coal combine there will ask the Illinois miners to work ten hours per day in order to relieve the situation.

Mr. Menche stated very emphatically that the miners would never consent to this.

He declared that the operators and railroads are solely to blame for the existing coal famine, and that some mines in the State are idle because of the scarcity of coal cars.

Mr. Menche declared that there are to-day 36 miles of loaded cars in Chicago alone, and that they have been there for some time, and that here in Springfield the Chicago and Alton has four strings of coal cars three blocks each in length.

He declared that the people are being misled by false statements by the operators and railroad officials, and that the miners would not work ten hours per day even if offered overtime.

I have the high and proud honor of representing a wealthy coal mining district in this Congress, and in the mines of my district there was no strike last summer. I can bear truthful witness to the fact from my own personal knowledge that at the coal mines operated in my Congressional district there was a dire car famine long before there was a coal famine in this country. The miners in these mines were not given a chance to work full time. They were not only willing but they were extremely anxious to work full time. In numberless cases these men went to the mines early in the morning arrayed in their working clothes and carrying in their dinner pails their food supplies for the day and in their canteens their coffee for the day. Arriving at their destination they were informed that there were no cars on the switch, nor were any cars expected during the day, and consequently there was in sight no opportunity for work for that particular day. They were compelled to return reluctantly to their respective homes with their dinner pails and canteens still filled, their hearts heavy on account of no prospect for a day's much-needed wages in the family.

Why were the cars withheld? Is it not reasonable to assume that a deliberate and deep-laid plot was formed behind the closed doors of some dark star-chamber somewhere to create the prevailing famine, so that high prices might be extorted and dividends and profits increased? Surely the miners in the Central West could have no material interest in the matter. Their mines are all unionized. The scale of wages under which they worked was agreed upon a long time before the miners in the anthracite fields laid down their tools and refused to work any longer under prevailing conditions. The miners in the Central West receive precisely the same wages now for their work which they received last summer; not one cent more. The contract under which they are working was in existence then and will continue to be in force until late in the springtime, when the songs of the birds and the hirp of the cricket will have announced the return of days which will put an end to the coal famine for the time being at least.

Give the miners access to the locked up storehouse of nature and the danger of coal famines in the future in this country will be entirely eliminated. I desire to say for the miners that they have done their utmost and have strained every nerve to relieve the coal famine in this country. It is to their interest to do so. The bread-and-butter question for them is involved in the portentious controversy. Only the other day the following letter to the miners was issued from the headquarters of the miners' organization. I beg leave to reproduce it here. It speaks for itself in an eloquence which I would not dare to undertake to imitate:

PHILADELPHIA, January 12, 1903.

To all Officers and Members of Local Unions of the United Mine Workers of America in the Anthracite Region:

GENTLEMEN: You are no doubt aware that a serious coal famine exists in all the Eastern and seaboard cities, due to the shortage of the anthracite coal supply. The situation has reached an acute stage, and has resulted in great suffering and hardship to the poor of the cities, whose earnings are insufficient to enable them to pay the excess prices now being charged for fuel, and it is subjecting the general public to great inconvenience.

To relieve the situation and alleviate as far as possible the suffering now being endured is the duty of every one connected with the production of coal. With this end in view we are prompted to address this communication to all members of our union, and request that they cooperate with the management of the mines in an effort to increase the production of coal. The gravity of the situation is such as to require that every mine worker shall exert himself and use every means at his command to this end.

Upon reading this communication in the columns of the daily papers, local unions should hold meetings and devise means whereby the daily output of the mines may be increased. These efforts should be continued until the weather moderates and the great necessity for fuel shall have passed.

JOHN MITCHELL,
President United Mine Workers of America.
T. D. NICHOLLS,
THOMAS DUFFY,
JOHN FAHY,
Presidents Anthracite Districts.

If the laws were enforced with rigor against vast combinations of capital which, in their greed, conspire to make bread and fuel dear to the people by artificial and illegal means, there would be no coal famine in Chicago and other Western cities. In the mines from which they draw the bulk of their supply there was no enforced cessation of work in a period covering a number of years.

President Mitchell, of the United Brotherhood of Mine Workers of America, is frequently spoken of in disrespectful and sneering terms in this section of the country because, as a resident of Illinois, he has been an active factor in the controversy which has waged between labor and capital in Pennsylvania. For the fact that he is a resident of the great State of Illinois the able president of the United Mine Workers of America will make no apologies. He is proud of Illinois, as Illinois is and ever will be justly proud of him. His fame and the field of his usefulness have broken mere State bounds and crossed State limits. He is not the State president, but he is the national president of the great and powerful organization which he represents.

We love and admire John Mitchell in Illinois. Risen to eminence from the ranks of actual toil, he has proved himself a matchless leader of men. Throughout the troublous times in which he played the star part in the drama, he has uniformly borne himself with a dignity and a broad-mindedness and an intelligence and a spirit of toleration and profound human sympathy which has challenged the admiration of all mankind. His manly conduct stands out in striking contrast with that of his opponents in the great controversy, and their lick-spittles, his detractors and maligners. Always respectful of the rights of others, unceasingly counseling obedience to the law, standing for justice, for his toiling brethren, and for their wan-faced wives and their oppressed and abused children, he has shown himself a reliable and trustworthy leader, an admirable American, and every inch a man.

The Eastern operators complain because they are not permitted to deal with their employees individually or as local and isolated unions. They denounce the change as an unwarranted innovation. They bid its coming unwelcome. There's the rub. They themselves are strongly organized, and are consequently all powerful. But they deprecate the fact that the miners show a disposition and are taking steps to similarly band themselves together. They want to continue the condition under which their employees are completely at their mercy. They want to be left severely alone in the unscrupulous and shameless exploitation of their labor. They prefer to deal with the scattered forces of labor rather than with a strong and virile central federation. In their selfishness and desire to grab and hold everything in sight they very naturally resent the formation of a strong national organization with which their operatives are affiliated, clothed with a power to formulate specific demands and to enforce the inviolability of contracts and solemn compacts entered into.

But the solidarity of labor is a fact which demands recognition. Labor has the same right to organize its forces along legal lines which capital has. A union card is a certificate of honor proudly borne by union men. The workingman has rightfully appointed himself his brother's keeper.

In so doing he has violated no law of God, no law of nature, nor any existing law of the land. On the contrary, he has obeyed the highest precept of the Christian religion and of the humantarian's creed. He has come to realize the vital fact that an injury to one is an injury to all. There is no use in the Baers and the Markels and the Pierpont Morgans to try to squirm out of that. It is a stern condition and not an idle theory that confronts them, and they might as well realize and gracefully accept that fact now as later on in the industrial development of the country.

If this arrogant monopoly centered here in the East would have conceded to their employees what was conceded to the miners in the middle western country five years ago there would have been no coal strike in Pennsylvania last summer. The strike commission appointed by the President shortly before the election would not be wrestling with the question of settling the differences between the Pennsylvania operatives and their operators this minute.

The anthracite coal fields in Pennsylvania are the richest coal fields in the world. The wealth of all the gold regions on the globe pales into pitiful insignificance as compared with the treasure deposited there. It is simply enormous and fabulous in extent, beyond human conception, beyond the reach of the most fertile and fantastic imagination. The men who have secured the title to those fields could well afford to pay the best wages. Greater prosperity should, in the natural order of things, prevail there than anywhere else on God's green footstool.

Involuntary poverty would be impossible there were justice done. It would be a happy byword, devoid of actuality in fact. Those fields should be a paradise for everyone who has settled there and picked out that locality for the building of a home. And yet it is not. The anomaly is due to the fact that selfishness and cupidity, heartless and rapacious greed, have taken the place of justice and fair dealing in this providentially favored section of our country. Millions and billions, which are not earned but which accrue because of the possession of unjust and unfair privilege, are piled up on the one hand, while poverty reigns supreme on the other and the dreadful image of want and misery stalks grim through the forlorn sweeps of the lonely valleys.

The impotency of Congress to rescue those people from their distress and bring them succor and relief from their suffering is admitted candidly on this floor. The humiliating confession is made with a nonchalance which would be admirable were it in evidence in a different place and under less provoking circumstances. The State legislature of Pennsylvania stands palsied by. It also refuses to act. That legislative body also confesses its helplessness and hopeless incompetency in the face of the conditions. It seems to be on a strike, though it convened for the alleged purpose of doing work some days ago. It has no remedies to suggest. It offers no hope for relief. It seems to lack the courage as well as the ability to grapple with the perplexing problem. The Government abdicating and confessing its inability to cope with the situation, the only thing that is left for the toilers to do is to resort to the expedient of self-help; in other words, to organize in the hope of securing a betterment of their conditions.

The great labor problem in the last analysis is after all a problem of high wages; nothing more than that and nothing less. High wages means prosperity for the toilers. Prosperity for the toilers means ability to buy in the markets of the country. That in turn means good prices for his produce to the farmer, prosperity for the business man, prosperity for the professional man, general prosperity for the community. That is what we want and that is what we are all striving for. It means better equipped schools, better equipped churches, better stocked libraries, more leisure, a greater degree of happiness, and a higher order of culture for the country and for the race.

In Illinois the miners' union has done that for the miners which the legislature and Congress confessed and proved themselves unable to do. It raised them from the slough of despair. It elevated them from their misery and degradation. It raised the wages of the miner from 17 cents to 49 cents a ton, from an average of less than a dollar to an average of considerably more than $3 a day. It gave him vastly improved conditions of employment. It filled him with hope and confidence in the future in the relentless and bitter struggle for existence. It took children out of the mines and transferred them to the schoolroom. It shortened the hours of toil. It restored happy homes where starvation and misery had held their undisputed sway. Can you blame the Pennsylvania miners for looking in Illinois for a competent leader? I, for one, unhesitatingly say that I can not.

More than the repeal of this duty, for the imposition of which there never was a shadow of an excuse, will be required from this Congress before this controversy, the irrepressible conflict, has reached its final conclusion. In Illinois a coal trust is also forming. Its completion will aggravate the situation and will render more difficult the solution of the problem. Railroad corporations are buying up the undeveloped coal fields with a rapidity that is amazing to the observing mind. In these coal fields is treasured the fuel supply of the future. In their monopolization lies an imminent peril. The combination is in active process of forming there which will become a part of the notorious Eastern conspiracy. It will be gobbled up by the Eastern conspiracy as soon as the time is ripe and the occasion opportune. It will afford a juicy chance for more stockjobbing. No trust will stop in its encroachments on the rights of the people until it is forced to. Nothing can put a stop to it except legislation and the enforcement of the law by Congress, the President, and his Attorney-General, aided by the State authorities. Legislation and the enforcement of the law will ultimately put a stop to the trust evil in this country. It will clip its wings before it proceeds much farther in its hazardous ventures. The limit of human endurance will be reached. It has been reached already.

The present coal famine is a national calamity of stupendous proportions. I deeply deplore the fact that it afflicts the country. And yet these trials seem to be necessary incidents in the progress of the world. The coal famine will arouse the people, and it will serve to warn them of the dangers which menace their future. It is only a forerunner. It is only a danger signal. Worse will follow if it goes unheeded. The people must elect men to their legislative assemblies who will fearlessly make adequate laws to meet the conditions of the times, and they must elect men to executive offices who will fearlessly enforce them after they are placed upon the books.

You say you have exhausted your power. I deny the assertion. I charge that you have not begun to exercise the power which is delegated to you and which you are commissioned by the people to employ. It is your solemn and sworn duty to set the machinery of the law in motion with a determination to break up illegal combinations of wealth without trembling in awe or exercising favoritism. It is your solemn and sworn duty to strengthen, to fortify, to vitalize, and to virilize existing statutes if they are found to be inadequate and impotent. It is your solemn and sworn duty to break this crisis and to relieve the fatal situation which confronts the people. Government is only an impotent and helpless thing when those charged with administration of it are incompetent or shrink in abject cowardice or from some other motive to perform the duty with which they are clothed. You are here to act. Action is demanded of you, not faltering and indolence and inactivity. Nothing but telling and vigorous action will satisfy the people. Now is the time to strike. Then, in God's name, strike. Carry out the promises which you made to the people and which you led them to believe were made in sacred good faith.

There is room for all God's children
On His beautiful broad earth.
There is work and food and fuel
For each being come to birth.
On each mortal son and daughter
He bestowed air, land, and water—
Love's bequest to human worth.

Greed has grasped for private uses
What was bounty for us all;
Greed has built a towering fortress
And sits guarded by its wall.
But the protest of opinion
Surges hard on his dominion,
And his fortress yet shall fall.

I can hear the tide increasing
In its volume and its force.
I foresee the wreck and ruin
It must cause upon its course.
For no hand can stop the motion
Of the tides of God's great ocean
When progression is their source.

But beyond the strife and chaos
That must follow for a span
I behold the peace and plenty
Of the great primeval plan—
I behold the full fruition
Of the dreamed of new condition
In the brotherhood of man.

The Trusts.

SPEECH

OF

HON. HENRY W. PALMER,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 7, 1903,

On the bill (H. R. 17) requiring all corporations engaged in interstate commerce to file returns with the Secretary of the Treasury, disclosing their true financial condition, and of their capital stock, and imposing a tax upon such as have outstanding capital stock unpaid in whole or in part—

Mr. PALMER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Complaint is made that certain combinations of capital in the form of corporations chartered by different States and extensively engaged in transacting the manufacturing business of the country are exceeding their privileges by seeking a monopoly of markets, and that the means used to effect this result is restraint of trade by various means, and destruction of competition by destroying competitors.

It may be admitted that there is ground for the complaint. The heavy hand of the so-called trusts has been laid upon individuals in all parts of the country, and the wail of the injured has arisen from every point of the compass.

Remedies many are proposed, more or less effectual. They are generally repressive measures calculated to restrain the alleged evils growing out of this great and unusual industrial development.

Anyone capable of comprehending the legal and economic relations of the subject can not fail to be impressed with the manifold difficulties that beset the path of the lawmakers at every step.

The dual nature of the Government; the fact that the corporations called trusts are the lawful creations of sovereign States and are mainly engaged in lawful business; that the power of Congress is inexorably limited by the grants of the Constitution, which as construed and defined by the Supreme Court forbids interference with manufacturing within a State; that a large part of the business of the country is now carried on by the so-called trusts, and that their destruction or serious disturbance would involve loss of employment to millions of workmen, destruction of billions of value held by honest investors, and general conditions of bankruptcy and ruin to the most prosperous people and nation on earth, are all properly and necessarily to be considered by wise and prudent men who wish to do good and not evil.

One of the methods that is suggested by which the corporations may be brought under Federal control is to grant them Federal charters.

The first inquiry, naturally, is, has Congress the right, under the powers conferred by the Constitution to regulate commerce, to charter business corporations for the purpose of manufacturing and selling goods which enter interstate and foreign commerce?

Second. If the power exists to incorporate such companies, would its exercise be expedient and beneficial to the people?

Reference to what has been done by Congress may assist in determining what may be done.

Under the authority to regulate commerce, the act of 1890, commonly called the Sherman Act, was passed. This act is entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies."

By its terms every contract in restraint of trade or commerce among the States is declared illegal, and every person making such a contract guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by fine or imprisonment. Every person who shall monopolize or attempt to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the States is also denounced as a criminal and subjected to punishment by fine or imprisonment.

The United States courts are invested with jurisdiction to enforce the act, and the district attorneys directed to institute proceedings under the direction of the Attorney-General to enforce the act. The broadest powers are given the courts to bring nonresidents within their jurisdiction from any part of the United States or the Territories, when necessary. Property owned under any such legal contract while in transportation from one State to another shall be seized, condemned, and forfeited to the United States. Any person injured by any such contract, trust, or corporation shall have the right to sue in any United States court when the defendant can be found within its jurisdiction, without respect to the amount in controversy, and may receive three times the actual damage. The word "person" in the act includes all corporations and associations existing with or without the authority of the laws of the States.

This act pays no respect to State lines or State laws. Corporate rights obtained under charters from sovereign States are not considered. The vast bulk of goods and property which enters into interstate commerce is swept within the grasp and control of the Federal law and made subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal court. Such property may be seized, condemned, and confiscated by the United States without respect to who owns, or where made, or to whom consigned. The rights of citizens of States, enjoyed since the the foundation of the States, to be tried in the courts of their domicile is taken away, and a citizen of South Carolina may be summoned before a United States court in Maine, and there, by due process of law, be deprived of his liberty and property. No edict of emperor or ukase of czar can be found more drastic or sweeping in severity of penalty or facility for enforcement. The full power of the legal machinery of the Government is placed at the disposal of an injured person. He may summon the chief law officer of the United States and his subordinates to prosecute his grievance and exact from the defendant a threefold damage.

This law has been adjudged to be within the power of Congress under the right to regulate commerce between the States. In no less than six cases the Supreme Court of the United States has maintained and enforced the law, viz, in the cases of United States v. Knight Company, 156 U. S., 1; United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association, 166 U. S., 290; United States v. Joint Traffic Association, 171 U. S., 505; United States v. Hopkins, 171 U. S., 578; Anderson v. United States, 171 U. S., 604; and Addyston Pipe and Steel Company v. United States, 175 U. S., 211. Attorney-General Knox summarized these cases as follows:

In the Knight Case there was involved an alleged monopoly in the production of sugar, commonly known as the "sugar trust;" in the Freight Association and Joint Traffic Association cases, agreements among interstate railways fix and maintain rates and fares; in the Hopkins and Anderson cases, two live-stock exchanges located in Kansas City, and in the Addyston Pipe and Steel Company case a combination among competing shops located in different States, and engaged in making cast-iron pipe for gas, water, and sewer purposes, to control prices by suppressing competition among themselves.

In the Knight case the court held that the creation of a monopoly in production does not necessarily and directly restrain commerce among the States. The court drew the line between production and interstate commerce, the former being subject to the regulation of the States, the latter alone to that of Congress.

In the Freight Association case the court held that the antitrust law applies to railroads and that it prohibits all agreements in restraint of interstate commerce, whether the restraint be reasonable or unreasonable.

This was followed by the Joint Traffic decision, the court holding in addition that the antitrust law is valid and constitutional and that Congress has the power to say that a contract shall not be lawful which restrains trade or commerce among the several States by stifling competition.

In the Hopkins case it was held that the business of the members of the Kansas City Live Stock Exchange was not interstate commerce within the meaning of the antitrust law, and therefore the agreement creating that exchange did not operate to restrain trade or commerce among the several States.

In the Anderson case the court took the view that whether the members of the Traders' Live Stock Exchange of Kansas City were or were not engaged in interstate commerce, the agreement creating the exchange was not one in restraint of such trade.

In the Addyston Pipe Company case the court held that Congress may prohibit the performance of any contract between individuals or corporations where the natural and direct effect is to regulate or restrain interstate commerce, and that a combination among formerly competing shops which directly restrained not simply the manufacture but the sale of a commodity among the several States comes within the antitrust law.

The question whether Congress has plenary power over goods and property that enter into interstate commerce is therefore settled, and it is settled also that whoever engages in such commerce must do it subject to the rules and regulations provided by Federal laws.

The Congress of the United States has also exercised the power to grant Federal charters to carry on the business of banking in the States under which the sovereign power of the States to impose taxes has been limited; to construct railroads across the territory of States without their consent; to condemn land within the States in order to carry out the purposes of the powers vested in the Government by the Constitution, and to incorporate trades unions with authority to exist in any and all States, and to hold such land as may be necessary for their business.

In the execution of the power to regulate commerce, Congress has established ports of entry and delivery, divided the coast into collection districts, granted coasting licenses, excluded foreign-built vessels from the coasting trade, expended money in surveying, sounding, and charting navigable rivers, cleaning out and improving channels, established custom-houses, warehouses, scales, etc., erected light-houses, stationed light-ships, denied the power of the States to tax freight transported from State to State, or to discriminate against owners of goods brought into a State for sale, or to exact a license from persons dealing in foreign goods. Congress has taken private property in the exercise of the power to regulate commerce (148 U. S., 312), constructed railroads across States and Territories, exercised the right of eminent domain, and regulated fares and freights. (California v. Central Pacific, 127 U. S., 1.)

The power to regulate commerce, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself and has no limitation other than that prescribed by the Constitution (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1).

The power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce vested in Congress is the power to prescribe rules by which it shall be governed; that is, the conditions upon which it shall be conducted; to determine when it shall be free and when subject to duty and other exactions (114 U. S., 196).

The power of Congress extends to acts done on land which interfere with, obstruct, or prevent the due execution of the power to regulate commerce and navigation with foreign nations and among the States, and such acts may be punished by Congress (U. S., 2; 12 Pet., 72).

These things Congress has done. Has the limit of power been reached?

It may be of interest to inquire what commerce really is, as defined by the Supreme Court. Chief Justice Fuller, in United States v. Knight (156 U. S., 11), said:

The Constitution does not provide that interstate commerce shall be free, but, by the grant of this exclusive power to regulate it, it was left free except as Congress might impose restraints.

No limitation has ever been fixed by the Supreme Court to the phrase "commerce among the States." Its narrowest definition at least embraces "the conduct of individuals" "in buying and selling or barter."

On argument in Gibbon v. Ogden (9 Wheaton) it was claimed that navigation was not included within the meaning of the term; and the court remarked, at page 190:

"The mind can scarcely conceive of a system for regulating commerce (between the States) which shall * * * be confined to prescribing rules for the conduct of individuals in the actual employment of buying and selling or of barter."

Other deliverances on the subject are as follows:

"Commerce is undoubtedly traffic. But it is also something more; it is intercourse." (Gibbon v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 181.)

"Sale is the object of importation, and it is an essential element of commerce." (Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 419.)

"Commerce is intercourse; one of its most ordinary ingredients is traffic." (Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 446.)

"Commerce is a term of the largest import. It comprehends intercourse for the purpose of trade in any and all of its forms, including the transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities between the citizens of our country and the citizens of other countries, and between the citizens of different States." (Welton v. State of Missouri, 1 Otto, 275.)

"Commerce with foreign countries and among the States, strictly considered, consists in intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation and the transportation and transit of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities." (County of Mobile v. Kimball, 102 U. S., 702.)

"The negotiation of sales of goods which are in another State, for the purpose of introducing them into the State in which the negotiation is made, is interstate commerce." (Robbins v. Shelby Taxing District, 120 U. S., 497.) (1886.)

"While the completely internal commerce of a State is reserved to the State itself, because never surrendered to the General Government, commerce, the regulation of which is committed by the Constitution to Congress, comprehends traffic, navigation, and every species of commercial intercourse or trade between the United States, among the several States and the Indian tribes." (Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson, 154 U. S., 447.) (1894.)

"Definitions as to what constitutes interstate commerce are not easily given, so that they shall clearly define the full meaning of the term. We know from the cases decided in this court that it is a term of very large significance. It comprehends, as it is said, intercourse for the purpose of trade in any and all its forms, including transportation, sale, purchase, and the exchange of commodities between the citizens of different States." (Justice Peckham in Hopkins v. United States, October 24, 1898, 171 U. S., 597.)

(See United States v. Addyston Pipe and Steel Company, 54 U. S., App. 723 et seq. Supreme Court decision December 4, 1899, 175 U. S., 211.)

Commerce, according to these definitions, in its narrowest definition embraces the "conduct of individuals in buying, selling, and barter." The power to regulate it is not extended to prescribing rules and regulations for the conduct of individuals in the actual employment of buying and selling or of barter; it is something more than traffic; it is intercourse for the purpose of trade in any and all its forms between citizens of different States and foreign countries. Over the subject of commerce and over the persons engaged in commerce the most plenary jurisdiction has been lawfully exercised by Congress.

Among the instrumentalities by which commerce is carried on, and without which it can not successfully be conducted, are corporations. May Congress create a necessary instrumentality by which and through which commerce may be conducted, viz, a corporation? The corporations now existing, except the Pacific railroads, engaged in the business of interstate commerce are creatures of the States. The right to exist depends on the State laws. Beyond the borders of the State of its paternity a corporation exists and does business only by permission of the sovereignty which it enters. By comity alone, not by right, the corporations of the several States transact business outside their State of creation.

Any State may exclude the corporations of another State or admit it only on terms that would be prohibitory. The exclusion of the Standard Oil Company from the State of Texas is a case in point. The right to amend or repeal charters is reserved by many, if not all, the States of the Union. Of course the repeal of the charters of all corporations engaged in interstate commerce is an unthinkable proposition, but the right to do it exists. Suppose the States of the Union saw fit to exercise this right. Commerce would languish and die. To meet this intolerable condition, should it arise, has Congress the power to grant charters to business corporations to engage in interstate commerce, authorizing them to transact business in all the States and Territories of the United States? Having power to regulate, may Congress not provide an instrumentality necessary to the existence of the thing to be regulated? It is no answer to say, "There is no danger; the States never will perpetrate such an act of ineffable folly." The question is not whether the necessity will ever arise, but whether, if it should arise, the power exists in Congress to rescue from destruction the commerce between the States, which it has the undeniable power to regulate.

We may therefore conclude that Congress, having the power to regulate commerce, has all necessary power to effectuate the purpose for which the right was conferred. The right to regulate commerce was surrendered by the States to the Federal Government for the purpose of preserving it free and unhampered by State restrictions. Perhaps no subject received more anxious consideration in the convention that framed the Constitution. One of the chief reasons for calling the convention was to vest the power somewhere, free commerce from the intolerable restrictions of the States, and secure the right to make commercial treaties with other countries. The following extracts from the debates in the convention are interesting and instructive. (Doc. Hist. Const., vol. 3, p. 636, commencing with Mr. Pinckney, ending with Mr. Wilson, p. 639.)

Mr. Pinckney moved to postpone the report in favor of the following proposition: "That no act of the legislature for the purpose of regulating the commerce of the United States with foreign powers, or among the several States, shall be passed without the assent of two-thirds of the members of each House." He remarked that there were five distinct commercial interests: 1, the fisheries and West Indian trade, which belonged to the New England States; 2, the interest of New York lay in a free trade; 3, wheat and flour, the staples of the two Middle States (New Jersey and Pennsylvania); 4, tobacco, the staple of Maryland and Virginia, and partly of North Carolina; 5, rice and indigo, the staples of South Carolina and Georgia. These different interests would be a source of oppressive regulations if no check to a bare majority should be provided. States pursue their interests with less scruple than individuals. The power of regulating commerce was a pure concession on the part of the Southern States. They did not need the protection of the Northern States at present.

Mr. Martin seconded the motion.

General Pinkney said it was the true interest of the Southern States to have no regulation of commerce; but considering the loss brought on the commerce of the Eastern States by the Revolution, their liberal conduct toward the views (he meant the permission to import slaves; an understanding on the two subjects of navigation and slavery had taken place between those parts of the Union, which explains the vote on the motion depending, as well as the language of General Pinkney and others) of South Carolina, and the interest the weak Southern States had in being united with the strong Eastern States, he thought it proper that no fetters should be imposed on the power of making commercial regulations; and that his constituents though prejudiced against the Eastern States, would be reconciled to this liberality. He had himself, he said, prejudices against the Eastern States before he came here, but would acknowledge that he had found them as liberal and candid as any men whatever.

Mr. CLYMER. The diversity of commercial interests of necessity creates difficulties which ought not to be increased by unnecessary restrictions. The Northern and Middle States will be ruined if not enabled to defend themselves against foreign regulations.

Mr. Sherman, alluding to Mr. Pinkney's enumeration of particular interests, as requiring a security against the abuse of the power, observed that the diversity was of itself a security, adding that to require more than a majority to decide a question was always embarrassing, as had been experienced in cases requiring the votes of nine States in Congress.

Mr. Pinkney replied that his enumeration meant the five minute interests. It still left the two great divisions of Northern and Southern interests.

Mr. Gouverneur Morris opposed the motion as highly injurious. Preferences to American ships will multiply them till they can carry the Southern produce cheaper than it is now carried. A navy was essential to security, particularly of the Southern States, and can only be had by a navigation act encouraging American bottoms and seamen. In those points of view alone, it is the interest of the Southern States that navigation acts should be facilitated. Shipping, he said, was the worst and most precarious kind of property, and stood in need of public patronage.

Mr. Williamson was in favor of making two-thirds instead of a majority requisite, as more satisfactory to the Southern people. No useful measure, he believed, had been lost in Congress for want of 9 votes. As to the weakness of the Southern States, he was not alarmed on that account. The sickliness of their climate for invaders would prevent their being made an object. He acknowledged that he did not think the motion requiring two-thirds necessary in itself, because if a majority of Northern States should push their regulations too far the Southern States would build ships for themselves; but he knew the Southern people were apprehensive on this subject and would be pleased with the precaution.

Mr. Spaight was against the motion. The Southern States could at any time save themselves from oppression by building ships for their own use.

Mr. Butler differed from those who considered the rejection of the motion as no concession on the part of the Southern States. He considered the interests of these and of the Eastern States to be as different as the interests of Russia and Turkey. Being, notwithstanding, desirous of conciliating the affections of the Eastern States, he should vote against requiring two-thirds instead of a majority.

Colonel MASON. If the Government is to be lasting, it must be founded in the confidence and affections of the people, and must be so constructed as to obtain these. The majority will be governed by their interests. The Southern States are the minority in both Houses. It is to be expected that they will deliver themselves bound hand and foot to the Eastern States and enable them to exclaim, in the words of Cromwell on a certain occasion: "The Lord hath delivered them into our hands!"

Mr. Wilson took notice of the several objections, and remarked that if every peculiar interest was to be secured, unanimity ought to be required. The majority, he said, would be no more governed by interest than the minority. It was surely better to let the latter be bound hand and foot than the former. Great inconveniences had, he contended, been experienced in Congress from the article of confederation requiring 9 votes in certain cases.

In Curtis's History of the United States, page 502, he says: "The great benefit, however, to be derived from a national regulation of commerce, a benefit in which all the States would equally share, whatever might be their production, was undeniably the removal of the existing and injurious restrictions which the States had hitherto practiced against each other."

In October, 1785, Washington wrote to James Warner, of Massachusetts, saying:

We have abundant reason to be convinced that the spirit of trade which pervades these States is not to be suppressed. It behooves us, then, to establish just principles, and this can not any more than other matters of national concern be done by thirteen heads, differently conducted and organized. The necessity therefore of a controlling power is obvious, and why it should be withheld is beyond my comprehension.

The want of power to regulate commerce and make treaties with foreign countries was a chief source of trouble in the Confederation. It was the chief cause of calling the convention that framed the Constitution. It was one of the profound subjects for debate, and one of the great factors in the action of the States in adopting the Constitution. In consideration of the concession of power to Congress to regulate commerce, the Southern States inserted the condition that exports should not be taxed, that the slave trade should not be prohibited until 1808, and that two-thirds of all the slaves should be counted as the basis of representation.

No State has the right to exclude from its borders the trade of interstate commerce, although it may exclude a foreign corporation from entering. The original package may go everywhere, despite State laws. The agent negotiating the sale of goods, the subject of interstate commerce, can not be excluded from a State by the imposition of license fees imposed under the taxing power.

Both agents and goods must be admitted. So much has already been decided. Then why may not Congress authorize an agency in the form of a business corporation organized under Federal law to do business in any State or Territory, if deemed necessary or useful to effectuate the purpose in view when the power to regulate commerce was conferred? Of the necessity Congress must be the sole judge. If the power exists, the time and circumstances of its exercise must rest in Congress. Legislative discretion is not removable by any court.

SECOND PROPOSITION.

If the power exists, would it be expedient and beneficial to the people to incorporate such companies?

Let the probable objections be considered:

First. Interference with the business of granting charters by the States.

Second. Federal control over such corporations would involve incidental control, and to some extent of the business of interstate corporations.

As to the first objection, the right of a State to grant charters of incorporation would not be affected. The financial injury that might result would be determined by the number of corporations that might seek Federal instead of State charters. The right to equally tax tangible property of such corporations doing business in a State would remain. Nothing would be lost but the right to tax the franchise. The extent of the financial injury that such an act would inflict is purely conjectural, and not worth considering. What the States lost in that respect the United States would gain, and the people of each State would be proportionally benefited.

As to the second objection:

No doubt there is a wide difference of opinion on the question of the expediency of any interference by the Government with the business of the country in any way, and no thoughtful person will contend that there is not good reason for such difference. Theoretically, the functions of government are fully performed when the people are protected in their rights of life, liberty, reputation, and the pursuit of happiness. Practically, as the conditions change and a nation emerges from a pastoral and bucolic state and engages extensively in manufacturing, transporting, and selling goods in the markets of the world, when nearly all the active business passes out of the hands of individuals and into the control of corporations upon the success of which a large proportion of the people are dependent for an opportunity to earn a living and upon which in a large measure the general prosperity and happiness depends, when the power and influence of such corporate bodies become great enough to exercise influence over the people's government in the great executive, legislative, and judicial departments, we may be at least brought to consider whether the rights of the individual to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness will not be best conserved by laying a regulating hand on the instrumentalities of trade, commerce, and manufacture, and by controlling any disposition on their part to usurp the functions of government, to monopolize the production and sale of the necessaries of life, or to unfairly use their power to hamper and destroy the competition of individuals.

Assuming that no sane persons desire the destruction of the business corporations of the United States, large or small, the question is whether under present conditions, in view of the fact that they are necessary to the prosperity of the people, they should not be brought under some authority that can keep them in subjection and within the sphere of their rights. The power of the States is confessedly and notoriously inadequate. The Federal Government alone is able to successfully undertake the task.

After all, this is a government of the people; the Congress is their Congress. That there is an almost universal demand for some kind of restraint upon the vast aggregations of capital that have lately sprung into existence is evidence that such restraint is needed. Some of the clamor is, no doubt, born of hatred of success and envy of prosperity; some comes from those who believe property a crime and its owners criminals; some comes from people who have very positive opinions, but who never think; but far more is based upon a reasonable apprehension that combinations in restraint of trade have been formed; that corporations intended to monopolize the production and sale of at least some of the necessaries of life do exist, and that well-organized and successful efforts have been made by them to ruin competitors and destroy competition.

If all these apprehensions are not well founded, if all the trusts are honestly pursuing lawful business in a lawful way, no act of Congress that is likely to be passed will disturb or make them afraid.

If corporations engaged in interstate commerce do not desire incorporation under Federal charters, they can not be compelled to take them out. If, on the other hand, such corporations, in order to escape the limitations, exactions, and annoyances imposed upon them by the States, are willing to submit themselves to the control of Congress, the opportunity would be given if a general Federal corporation act could be enacted. If corporations engaged in interstate commerce accepted Federal charters, the question of adequate and proper regulation and control would be vastly simplified.

The experience of the greatest manufacturing and commercial country in the world ought to be of value in seeking a solution of the question as to the method by which corporations may be safely created and the extent of the power that may be properly intrusted to them.

The English companies act, passed originally in 1882, and amended in 1886 and 1890, furnishes the method by which practically all corporations except banks may be incorporated. Under this law persons desiring to form a corporation may file a statement at the office of the registrar, setting forth minutely and in detail the kind, value, and location of their property, the amount of capital stock, the number of shares into which it is divided, the names of the directors and shareholders and the nature of the business meant to be carried on, and the kind of liability assumed by the directors and shareholders.

Several kinds of business may be conducted by the same company; there is no limit on the number or kinds. The amount of capital or number of shares is unrestricted. Once formed, the corporation may do business anywhere in the British Empire. New Jersey is not more liberal than Great Britain in granting charters of incorporation. The vast experience of this great manufacturing nation has eventually wrought the conclusion that the instrumentalities of business should be freely granted and be as little hampered by vexatious conditions as possible. Always retaining the right to knowledge of the property and purposes of corporations, and reserving such supervision as will enable creditors to wind up and fairly distribute the assets of bankrupt concerns, the English law allows the largest liberty to carry on any kind of business at any place in the Kingdom or Empire.

A Federal charter should allow a corporation to transact business in any State or Territory of the United States, subject only to such regulations as Congress might prescribe and to such taxation as the States impose on similar business agencies chartered by themselves, and no more. It may be assumed that Federal control over business corporations engaged in interstate commerce would be reasonable. The debate on the pending antitrust regulations has not developed a disposition on the part of the most ferocious enemies of trusts to do anything hurtful to legitimate and honest business enterprises. It is the dishonest and illegitimate enterprises brought into being for the purpose of swindling the public by imposing upon it worthless stock and bonds, as well as those other combinations conceived for the purpose of monopolizing some line of business, stifling competition, and restricting trade, against which indignation has been properly hurled. Perhaps the selection of concerns to be vituperated has not always been judicious, but abstractly no one can or cares to defend the class of corporations named. The people are entitled to an honest and legitimate use of the special privileges conferred upon capital by the grant of corporate functions. They ought not to be turned into engines of oppression to competitors or of robbery of consumers.

Honest business, honestly pursued, need fear nothing from this or any succeeding Congress.

Eulogy on the Life and Character of the late Hon. Joshua S. Salmon.

OF

HON. GEORGE G. GILBERT,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, Feburary 8, 1903.

On the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That, in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted, the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of Hon. JOSHUA S. SALMON, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of New Jersey.

"Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a faithful and distinguished public servant, the House, at the conclusion of the memorial proceedings of this day, shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk be, and is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased."

Mr. GILBERT said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Allow me briefly to contribute my mite of testimony in praise of the virtues and character of our departed friend.

When I first came to Congress I formed many new and valuable friendships, but none I appreciated more highly than that of Mr. SALMON. Indeed I may say truly that he was my most intimate friend in the House. Our seats were side by side and we were frequently together. During the last session of Congress I made some remarks in eulogy of the life and character of the late Hon. J. William Stokes, of South Carolina. When I sat down Mr. SALMON turned to me with a smile and said: "Well, now, that was well said. I do not expect to die soon, but if I should, would you say as nice things about me as you have just said about Mr. Stokes?" I answered that I hoped that I should never have such an occasion, and we turned the conversation to other matters. That occurred on the 26th of April, 1902, and to think that within ten days of that conversation Mr. SALMON was dead! Surely life is as uncertain as death is appalling. We have so many illustrations of the truth of that Holy Writ, which declares:

Two women shall be grinding together; the one shall be taken, and the other left.

Two men shall be in the field; the one shall be taken, and the other left.

How often can we in the retrospect of life recall instances when two of us have been alone together and the other and better one has been taken and we have been left. I know nothing of Mr. SALMON'S antecedents, but they must have been excellent, because in my short acquaintance with him I never knew a man of finer impulses, of broader sympathies, or of kindlier heart. Such a man and such a life are a great blessing to the world. The reflection of his smiles and the strength of his virtues furnish a stimulus to his survivors.

There are two consoling thoughts which are of special significance in the material universe around and about us. One is the evident fact that there is but one Architect in creation—planets, stars, and constellations have but one Builder. The other fact is that no substance can be destroyed and lost. Changes in form and combination of elements may occur, but everything is sacredly preserved. May we not, therefore, by analogy, conclude that spiritual things, which are higher than those which are material, are also preserved? I believe that nothing in the universe of God is lost. Our intellectual achievements, our mental attainments, our smiles and tears, our happiness and sorrows, our affections and hatreds are all preserved, and will be used in ascertaining our proper places when the balance sheet is made out for our starting point on the other shore. I believe that every ray of light, every emotion, and every good thing is preserved and used. In the sweet by and by we will see again the crucifixion, the landing of the Pilgrims, and whatever else has occurred in the material universe.

I believe that no flower was ever born to blush unseen, and that no flower ever wasted its sweetness upon the desert air. On the contrary, its beauty and its sweetness are preserved to ornament and perfume that house of many mansions. They are preserved along with smiles of affection and deeds of kindness which have not been seen or appreciated in this world. But Mr. SALMON occupied an exalted social position, and his career of usefulness was unusually prominent, and if every pure thought, every good deed, and every kindly smile is preserved and has its reward, our friend, Mr. SALMON, will have nothing to fear. He was a true man of the highest type. Loyal and true as statesman, as lawyer, as citizen, as husband, as father, and as friend. He stood as a splendid example of the world's highest and best.

Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And, departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time!

Footprints that perhaps another,
Sailing o'er life's solemn main,
A forlorn and shipwreck'd brother,
Seeing, shall take heart again.

Let us, then, be up and doing,
With a heart for any fate;
Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labor and to wait.

The Trusts.

SPEECH

OF

HON. WILLIAM T. ZENOR,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 5, 1903,

On the bill (H. R. 17) requiring all corporations engaged in interstate commerce to file returns with the Secretary of the Treasury, disclosing their true financial condition, and of their capital stock, and imposing a tax upon such as have outstanding capital stock unpaid in whole or in part.

Mr. ZENOR of Indiana said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The bill now before the House is a substitute by way of amendment for H. R. 17. The original bill seems to have been too drastic and far-reaching to suit the pleasure of the distinguished gentlemen who are to be affected by its provisions, and this substitute was reported by the majority of the committee to modify and so qualify the provisions of that bill as to utterly destroy all of its virtues and preserve all of its vices. It seems perfectly apparent from a comparison of the provisions of this measure as it was originally introduced with those of the substitute bill reported that a radical and revolutionary change has been wrought in the mind of the distinguished gentleman from Maine in charge of same on the floor on behalf of the majority [Mr. LITTLEFIELD].

The original bill, introduced by him December 2, 1901, provided that all of its terms and restrictions should apply to all corporations engaged in interstate commerce. Its provisions required that all corporations engaged in interstate commerce should file returns with the Secretary of the Treasury disclosing their true financial condition, their capital stock, and imposing a tax upon such as had outstanding capital stock unpaid in whole or in part, etc. The substitute bill reported excepts from its operations all corporations and trusts that are now in existence or have heretofore been organized, and is confined alone and exclusively to corporations and trusts hereafter to be organized. In other words, Mr. Chairman, the bill now presented to this House and to the country only proposes to deal with the prospective trusts and unlawful combinations hereafter to be organized.

It only proposes to exact of those trusts and monopolies hereafter to come into life and being for the purpose of engaging in interstate commerce a return as therein provided, setting out and showing the date of their organization, its name, when and where organized, giving statutes and all amendments thereto under which it is organized, the constituent companies of which it is composed, its capital stock and the shares into which it is divided, par value, whether common or preferred, and the distinction between each, etc. This is the requirement provided in the bill to secure what is denominated "publicity." It is indeed a most remarkable proposition that such a requirement should be confined to future and unborn trusts and monopolies and not to present and existing ones.

If any argument was needed to convince the unprejudiced mind or impartial judgment of the fact that this whole bill is a huge and howling farce, designed upon the one hand to placate and deceive a long-suffering and patient people, and upon the other to hold out to the monopolies and trusts the olive branch of peace, it may be found in the unjust and inexcusable discrimination in favor of the only monopolies of which complaint is made. Why is it, and what reasons can be given for not including the existing trusts and monopolies within the provisions of this proposed measure of legislation?

Why say that you propose to shackle the greed and avarice of men who may hereafter conclude, if they do conclude, to organize a trust for the purposes of interstate commerce? Why direct this legislation to the future and against corporations that have no existence, and may never have any, rather than against those whose gigantic growth and power have enabled them to fill the land with the wreck and ruin of their helpless victims? It is not against trusts yet to be formed; it is not against corporations yet to be chartered; it is not against monopolies hereafter to be created that complaint is made. It is the evils of the present; it is the oppressions now experienced, the industrial and commercial supremacy of these unlawful institutions and their unhallowed greed for profits and power and further conquest that complaint is made, and from which the country is demanding relief.

In answer to this request, in response to this crying demand, the majority of the Judiciary Committee of this House, having had under consideration for weeks and months some measure of legislation to afford the people some tardy relief, have at last presented to the country as the best measure that their wisdom and statesmanship can devise this bill—a bill that does not relate to a single corporation, trust, or monopoly now in operation; a bill that does not touch a single combine throughout the entire country—a bill that nowhere mentions the word "trust;" a bill that with studied and consummate skill has been so worded and constructed that it does not even remotely threaten harm to or interference with these friends and allies of the Republican party in their onward march of usurpation—a bill that may well be regarded, as no doubt it is by these economic and industrial vampires, as an express license to pursue their work of spoliation, robbery, and theft; a bill that, through fear of its authors, might possibly be construed by the courts, if any of its provisions were left obscure, against the trusts or their interests is made to contain the express declaration that it shall not affect in any manner whatever the already organized and combined wealth of the nation behind these monstrous public enemies. No one is hostile to legitimate corporations. They are essential and necessary.

This is the kind of bill we are called upon to pass as the only remedy proposed by the Republican party to cure the well-known and confessed evils of the trusts. That it will fall far short of the just expectations of all earnest and sincere friends of effective legislation in this behalf can not be doubted. That it fails to go to the full extent of the constitutional powers of Congress, and demanded by the exigencies of the situation can not well be disputed. The whole bill is predicated upon the one clause of the Constitution—the interstate-commerce clause. It completely ignores the power of taxation. It refuses to invoke by any express provision the power vested in Congress to deny to such interdicted trusts or monopolies the use of the facilities of the mails, telegraph, and telephones. It fails to provide for any adequate penalty for default in making such returns as required by the provisions of the act. It fails to define sufficiently what shall constitute an offense under sections 5, 6, and 7, for which it provides a penalty.

It fails to give jurisdiction to the State courts over such corporations as are embraced in its provisions where such corporation does or carries on business, the same as if created in such State, as other citizens thereof are subject to such jurisdiction. It fails to place on the free list all articles manufactured or produced by a trust, and in many other respects is lame and defective. To cure these or many of these defects, and to make the bill more effective and perfect, notice has been given by the Democratic minority that at the proper time, when the bill shall come to be considered under the five-minute rule, they will offer amendments supplying these defects and, in addition, will offer as new sections the following:

Amendment No. 6: Amend by adding the following:

"SEC. —. That in addition to the grounds of bankruptcy now existing by law, a corporation shall have committed an act of bankruptcy, and shall accordingly be subject to proceedings to adjudge it an involuntary bankrupt and wind up its affairs and distribute its assets, first, whenever it shall have issued stock in excess of the fair, reasonable value of its property; or, second, whenever it shall have given or offered to any person, association, or corporation any privilege, preference, advantage, facilities, discount, or rebate denied to or withheld from any other person, association, or corporation; or, third, whenever directly or indirectly it shall have engaged in any conspiracy or entered into any combination, agreement, or understanding to monopolize or aid in monopolizing any product of general utility, or so much thereof as to affect injuriously the general welfare, or to stifle lawful competition, or to control or affect injuriously the price of or the market for any commodity in general use or demand; or, fourth, whenever it shall have effected or attempted to effect any consolidation, combination, cooperation, undertaking, or agreement with any other corporation, association, or person, contrary to any law of the United States or of any State in which it shall do or offer to do any business."

Amendment No. 8: Amend by adding the following:

"SEC. —. That any property owned or manufactured under any contract or by any trust or combination or pursuant to any conspiracy forbidden by the laws of a State, and being in the course of transportation from such State to another State, the District of Columbia, a Territory, or a foreign country, or to such State from another State, the District of Columbia, a Territory, or a foreign country, shall be forfeited to the United States, and may be seized and condemned by like proceedings as are provided by law for the forfeiture, seizure, and condemnation of property imported into the United States contrary to law; and every person who shall, knowing that any property to be owned or manufactured in any of the ways above described, transport it, or cause or order, or contract for its transportation as above described, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, be punished by a fine not exceeding $20,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be held to interfere with any proceedings in a State court for the violations of any law thereof."

Amendment No. 9: Amend the substitute by adding the following:

"SEC. —. That hereafter the following articles may be imported into the United States free of all duty:

"1. Steel rails, structural steel, tin plate, iron pipe, and other metal tubular goods; wire nails, cut nails, horseshoe nails, barb wire, and all other wire; cotton ties, plows, and all other agricultural tools and implements.

"2. Borax, borate of lime, and boracic acid.

"3. Binding twine.

"4. Paris green.

"5. Paper, and pulp for the manufacture of paper.

"6. Salt.

"7. Plate glass and window glass."

Amendment No. 10: Amend the substitute by adding the following:

"SEC. —. The President is hereby authorized, and it shall be his duty, whenever it shall be shown to his satisfaction that by reason, wholly or materially, of the existence of the tariff or customs duty upon any article, such article, or articles of its class and kind, are monopolized or controlled by any person, organization, or combination to the detriment of the public, by proclamation to remove or suspend such duty, in whole or in part, until the next assembling of Congress, or until the abuse prompting him to such action shall have ceased."

Amendment No. 11: Amend by adding the following:

"SEC. —. There is hereby levied and shall be assessed and collected annually the following taxes on all corporations, whether domestic or foreign, doing business in the United States for profit or gain, and having a capital stock of $200,000 or more, at the rate of 10 per cent on its capital stock. The amount of the capital stock of any taxable corporation for the purposes of taxation shall be estimated according to its par value fixed by the charter, or by resolution of its board of stockholders or directors, and shall include all assets owned by such corporation which are reserved or funded or set aside for the benefit of its stockholders.

"SEC. —. Those corporations are exempt from taxation under this act whose income (or profits), after the payment of necessary expenses of operation and administration thereof, is devoted exclusively to purposes of charity or religion or benevolence, or to hospital, medical, surgical, or hygienic purposes; or to education, or the promotion of the useful arts; or to scientific purposes; or to literary or musical purposes; or to public entertainment."

Amendment No. 12: Amend by inserting the following just after section 6:

"SEC. 7. That no person engaged in the production, manufacture, or sale of any article of commerce, or violating any of the provisions of section 5 of this act, or attempting to monopolize or control the production, manufacture, or sale thereof by driving out competition in any particular locality by discrimination in prices or by giving special privileges or rebates or otherwise in order to destroy competition therein in such locality, shall use, either directly or indirectly, any of the facilities or instrumentalities of interstate commerce, or in any way engage in interstate commerce for the purpose of aiding or facilitating, either directly or indirectly, such production, manufacture, or sale with such intent; nor shall any other person or corporation use any of the facilities or instrumentalities of interstate commerce or in any way engage in interstate commerce in buying, selling, or disposing of any such article of commerce for the purpose of enabling such first-mentioned corporation to engage or to continue to engage in such production, manufacture, or sale or control with such intent. Every person violating any of the provisions of this section shall be punished, on conviction, by a fine of not less than $500 and not exceeding $5,000."

Amendment No. 13: Amend by adding a new section, as follows:

"SEC. —. The words 'interstate commerce' wherever they occur in this act shall be held to embrace commerce from any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia."

"SEC. —. If any corporation liable to taxation under this act shall establish to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, by competent proof, under oath, that it is not engaged or about to be engaged in any way with any other corporation or person in any of the acts or combinations, conspiracies, agreements, or in any act or conduct that is prohibited in the act entitled 'An act to protect trade against unlawful restraints and monopolies,' approved July 2, 1890, or in the act entitled 'An act to provide revenue for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States,' approved July 24, 1897, or an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, or this act, or any amendment of any of said acts, the said taxes of said corporation shall be remitted, except 1 per cent thereof, which shall be collected and paid into the Treasury of the United States.

"SEC. —. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, is charged with and is empowered to direct and enforce the execution of this act, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall make such regulations as are needful for such purpose. All laws applicable to the collection of internal-revenue taxes by the United States, whether civil or criminal, shall apply to corporations that are taxable under this act and to their officers and directors, and to the enforcing of the provisions hereof."

These amendments will be presented at the proper time by the Democratic minority, in the earnest belief that they will, if adopted, materially improve the bill and make it much more effective, complete, and adequate to meet the situation. Opportunity will be given each member of this House to test the sincerity and good faith of those who have and are now professing a desire to suppress the trusts and rid the country of their vicious influence. We upon this side of the House are anxious to go to the full extent of our constitutional right, and no further, to accomplish this purpose, and we trust that that side will not be content to do less.

If these amendments are not adopted and thereby fail to become a part of this law, and the bill of the majority is passed, as I know it will be, without these amendments, and it fails of its purpose, as I fear it will, then the responsibility must rest where it properly belongs. No partisan spirit has to any considerable extent entered into the debate upon this bill, and no partisan advantage should be sought in shaping this legislation. This is one of the occasions when a high sense of patriotic duty should dominate all other considerations; when the action of the American Congress should fearlessly assert its high prerogatives and prove itself worthy not only of the confidence of the people, but willing and capable of redeeming the repeated platform pledges of all political parties for the last decade.

As already suggested, the large part of the bill is devoted to "publicity." Publicity, indeed, is the most prominent and conspicuous feature of the whole proposition. The idea of "publicity" as a cure for the trust evil is not at all new. It is not original with the gentlemen composing the majority of the committee, who are responsible for this bill. It has been often suggested, and the President in his last two messages to this House repeated and pressed this phase of the question upon the attention of Congress, but it has never been considered, and the President himself does not wish to be understood as regarding publicity as a panacea—a cure for the evil. Publicity is well enough; it is very desirable, and, if the bill went far enough, might prove a most potent agency in furnishing information to the public that would be valuable, if for no other purpose, to enable further legislation to be formulated. All are agreed upon this question; Democrats and Republicans alike favor it. If, however, publicity is a good thing; if it will in any measure aid in the suppression of the evil, then why is it, we inquire of our Republican friends, that you are not willing to extend this law so as to include all corporations and trusts, and not confine it to those yet to be created? This is the question that needs to be answered. This is to me an obvious and patent defect in this bill, and one that should be cured by amendment. No sane and sensible excuse can be given for excepting all "trusts now in existence" from its operations, unless it be the excuse that it is not intended to molest or disturb the only trusts that are harmful to the country, for this is and will be the effect of it. Section 5 of the bill is perhaps the most important and valuable of all. This section is intended to restrain and suppress the criminal practice among common carriers of granting special rates, rebates, concessions, and facilities in respect to the transportation of property. It is intended to apply to all common carriers engaged in interstate or foreign commerce.

For a number of years an agitation has been going on throughout the country and many complaints made concerning the preferential rates and rebates granted by railroads and common carriers to certain rich and powerful shippers—trusts and corporations—to the great detriment of the great mass of shippers. This criminal conduct of the carriers and railroads engaged in such practice has resulted in virtually giving to the favored shippers a monopoly of the markets for the articles in which they deal and destroyed all competition. It has done more to build up and make supreme the Standard Oil Company, one of the most perfect and absolute monopolies of this or any other country, than all other agencies combined.

Its operation has been quite as disastrous in almost every branch of industrial activity where the favor has been invoked and granted. The Interstate Commerce Commission, organized in 1887 for the express purpose of dealing with this subject, has proven impotent to suppress the evil. It has been and is now claimed by that Commission that its powers are too restricted to enable it to remedy the trouble, and it has repeatedly in its reports called attention to this defect and asked that its powers be enlarged and made more comprehensive. Many bills have been introduced into this House from time to time by Democratic members, and I recall especially a very meritorious one by my distinguished friend from Texas, Mr. KLEBERG, calculated to cure many of the defects of this law and render it more effective, all of which have been consigned to their death in the committee room.

The bill now before the House may, however, if it shall become a law, supplement the interstate-commerce law and so strengthen and aid it that some good may be accomplished in the suppression of this vicious practice. The laws now upon the statute books relating to this subject have proven inefficient and inadequate, either because of a lack of strength, breadth, or comprehensiveness or want of inclination on the part of the Government officials to enforce them. Upon this question there are numerous and widely differing opinions. As for myself, with all due deference to those who may think otherwise, I am persuaded to believe that it has not been so much the fault of the law as the fault of the high officials of the Government, who have failed to discharge their duty.

The antitrust law of July 2, 1890, commonly known as the Sherman antitrust law, contains strong and drastic provisions against the trusts and denounces heavy pains and penalties against any combination in restraint of interstate trade and commerce. This law has substantially proven a dead letter and has been permitted to slumber all these years without in a single instance invoking its penal provisions in the prosecution of these violators. It is my opinion, and I believe the judgment of every intelligent and thoughtful person, that these lawbreakers and trust magnates have by far a more wholesome fear of the penitentiary, ball and chain, than of the fines and injunctions with which they have usually been threatened when molested at all. This law, which has been upon the statutes for over twelve years, is but little, if any, more than a redeclaration of the common law, and under either, if honestly enforced, trusts could not live or thrive.

The Attorney-General of the United States is especially charged with the duty and responsibility of initiating proceedings and prosecutions against offenders under the law as it now exists. This should not be the case. The law should make it the imperative duty of the courts having jurisdiction to call the attention of the grand juries of those courts to these violations of law and instruct them as to their duties in the premises; instruct them to make searching and rigid investigations of all charges of violations of the law and return bills of indictment against the criminal offenders. The law should go still further and make it the imperative duty of the Attorney-General, the prosecuting officer of the Government, to prosecute all cases thus returned and to initiate prosecutions in all cases where the facts within his knowledge are sufficient to induce the reasonable belief that the law has been violated. The people have long felt outraged at the manifest indifference of the chief officer of the Department of Justice, the Attorney-General of the United States, in the midst of the alarming growth of these trust combinations in the last three or four years.

They have, to a great extent, lost heart, and feel but little hope for the future as they survey the past. What influences have operated to stay the hand and hold in abeyance the prosecuting power of this Department of the Government may easily be surmised when we recall the fact that the present occupant of that high office, as well as his predecessor, were chosen from the ranks of those who had been in the service of the very men who constitute the head and front of these great "captains of industry," as some of our Republican friends are wont to characterize them. It could not in the very nature of things be expected to find such officials imbued with an over-zealous ambition to make undue haste to get into the courts against their former friends and benefactors. The President, in his speech against the trusts at Pittsburg, was particularly caustic in his arraignment of these industrial and commercial despots, and at the conclusion of the ceremonies shared with his friend Mr. Frick the hospitalities of his palatial home. This hospitality and courtesy is reciprocated when Mr. Frick visits the capital.

Mr. Knox, his Attorney-General, on the same occasion likewise indulged in unsparing criticisms of these trust monsters, and proceeds to outline a policy which he pretends to think would curb and check their sway. All the remedies suggested by these two high and distinguished officials have no reference to the removal of the causes producing the evils—contain no suggestions as to their views upon the conditions which have given rise to them. No word of encouragement to those who believe that one of the chief producing causes for this condition of things is the abnormally high tariff duties levied in the Dingley bill, and the removal of which is believed by many, both Republicans and Democrats, would afford at least a partial remedy.

The President, however, at this present session of Congress, in a message, called attention to the distress of the country and the demand for some immediate relief from the exorbitant prices charged by the coal trust. He suggested that prompt action be taken by Congress to remove the tariff duties from anthracite and bituminous coal, to the end that the people might get cheaper coal and fuel to keep them from freezing. A bill was at once reported by the Ways and Means Committee providing for the removal of this tariff and to place coal upon the free list for one year, and this bill passed this House by a unanimous vote. It went to the Senate and was there amended, as was proposed by the Democratic minority of the House, by placing anthracite coal permanently on the free list, and then passed the Senate and is now the law.

Here is an illustration of the inconsistency, if not absurdity, of the Republican position that tariff has nothing to do with the high price of the article upon which it rests, and that the removal of the tariff will afford no relief from the trust combines of the country. Since that law went into effect the price of coal has been reduced and the situation of distress much ameliorated. So it would be in reference to the trusts. But no, say our Republican friends, we must not touch this white elephant. It is sacred. It would destroy public confidence and ruin the business interest. This is the cry, and has always been, of the greed and avarice of the protected and fostered monopolies of this country. This is the cry to-day in reference to any effective legislation against this same interest.

Every monopolist of the country, every trust and combine, oppose any measure of legislation tending to affect in any way the operations of their combines. They stand in mortal fear that Congress may be induced to give heed, even though it be ever so small, to the cry of distress of the great mass of the people for some relief against their oppressions. I predict that before this bill shall pass the Senate, if it ever does, it will encounter what will seem to be the determined and obstinate resistance of the trust influences.

As harmless and impotent as I think this measure is, compared with what it should be, it will not be seemingly welcomed by the trusts. They have been so accustomed to join our Republican friends in their campaign slogan, "Let well enough alone," that they have about concluded that no change in the economic conditions of this country, no change in the economic laws of the country, should be made except with their full advice and consent. But their opposition to this measure will really not be to defeat, but to secure its passage. They are conscious that some move must be made, and this may satisfy clamor and not hurt them. They have come to be a power in the country and are diplomatic in their political movements. Under the fostering care of protection and kindred class legislation the trusts and combines are creatures to be reckoned with.

Their power and influence are felt in every avenue of trade and business activity. The beneficiaries of protection and the trusts and combines are one and the same, their genesis the same, their interests, purposes, and objects common, and their political affiliations with the Republican party homogeneous. It is therefore neither strange nor surprising to find them united by a common sympathy and by all the cohesive force of mutual support and reciprocal trade. These combinations are rarely ever forgotten in the stress of political campaigns by the Republican party, and they can doubtless show an unbroken record of party fealty in the past to which they hope they may not now appeal in vain. When the Republican party has in the past felt the need of the sinews of war, they have not appealed to these interests in vain.

Funds have been marshaled and revenues without stint or limit collected from these willing and generous supporters of that party, and they now feel that the time will again return when they may hope for similar favors. Certainly these favors are not bestowed without reward or some hope or promise thereof. They, the trust contributors, naturally expect to secure some benefit from their patriotic service. They are not philanthropists while they yet remain in politics.

When they abandon politics, they will retire from business. This will take place when they have amassed such fortunes as Mr. Carnegie, John D. Rockefeller, and others. When they have been permitted to exploit the people and rob and filch from the consuming masses, in exorbitant prices, profits, and dividends under unjust laws and special favors to their full satisfaction, then and not till then will they cease to be politicians and become philanthropists and go about the country building libraries, endowing colleges, after the fashion of Mr. Carnegie and John D. Rockefeller. Wealth and fortune in these days of commercial greed, regardless of the methods of its accumulation, secures to its possessor first place in the social world and all the honors of a national benefactor. He at once becomes lionized and idolized as one of the heroes of the great "captains of industry." It matters not how much misery, suffering, and pain he may have brought to the humble homes of the land nor how many wrecks he may have left in the pathway of his ruthless march to fortune, fame, and power, he has reached the summit and a patronizing public pay obsequious court, and there is not a fashionable drawing room or high-toned club in the land in which he is not an honored guest. Surely, if a trust is a criminal organization and the law so denounces it, then the promoters of these combinations are criminals and should be so regarded and treated. If the Standard Oil Company is a monopoly, and it has been so pronounced by the courts of the land, then John D. Rockefeller is a criminal and should be dealt with as such and treated as such.

If the United States Steel Corporation, capitalized at the modest sum of $1,389,339,956, is a trust—and who will doubt this—then this trust corporation is a criminal conspiracy against the trade and commerce of the country, and Mr. Carnegie, Frick, Schwab, and other promoters of the criminal organization are criminals, and should be treated and dealt with as other criminals of the land. If the American Tobacco Company, capitalized at $250,000,000, is a criminal trust—and it most certainly is—then the promoters and operators of this trust are likewise criminals, and should be treated as other common criminals are, and punished under the law. If the recently formed trust, known as the Consolidated Tobacco Company, intended to control all other tobacco companies, and capitalized at the sum of $262,000,000, is a criminal organization—and the law says that it is—then its promoters, owners, and operators are criminals of more than ordinary moral turpitude, for with perhaps the exception of the Standard Oil Company, with a capital of $700,000,000, this Consolidated Tobacco Company is the most cold-blooded and calculating of any mentioned affecting the American people. It not only controls the production of manufactured tobacco and its prices, but has gone still further—as others will ultimately do—and established itself in control of the raw material produced by the farmers.

Mr. Chairman, I might continue this list indefinitely almost, if time would permit and the case required. Enough, however, has been said to indicate the trend in the organization of these trusts and their constant drift into the exclusive possession of the markets and absorption of the business of the country. I desire here to include as part of my remarks and as a matter of information a list of industrial combinations or trusts with a capitalization of $10,000,000 each and over which were formed during the period from January 1, 1899, to September 1, 1902:

Trusts.	Date.	Amount.
Allis-Chalmers Co	1901	$36,250,000
Amalgamated Copper Co	1899	155,000,000
American Agricultural Chemical Co	1899	33,000,000
American Beet Sugar Co	1899	20,000,000
American Bicycle Co	1899	36,496,400
American Brass Co	1900	10,000,000
American Can Co	1901	82,456,600
American Car and Foundry Co	1899	60,000,000
American Grass Twine Co	1899	13,083,000
American Cigar Co	1901	10,000,000
American Hide and Leather Co	1899	34,025,000
American Ice Co	1899	41,705,000
American Iron and Steel Manufacturing Co	1899	20,000,000
American Light and Traction Co	1901	12,127,800
American Locomotive Co	1901	50,412,500

Total		4,318,005,646

Mr. Chairman, it will be observed from the above list that none of the trusts given are capitalized at less than $10,000,000, and the 82 combinations aggregate a capital of $4,318,005,646. The total number of combinations in the nature of trusts organized and in existence at this time in the United States are about 800, with a capitalization of over $9,000,000,000. If to this list were added railroad consolidations, the outstanding capitalization would approximate more than $15,000,000,000, or near one-sixth of the total wealth of the United States.

I am heartily in favor of some additional trust legislation. Some legislation that will further aid and strengthen the existing laws upon this subject, if, as claimed by many, they need this to crush out and exterminate these evils. I want no excuse left to those who are charged with the duty of enforcing the law to say to the people of this country that they are unable to accomplish this object because the law is defective; because the necessary power to this end has not been given them. I am reminded by this bill of the position assumed by the Republican party in the closing days of the Fifty-sixth Congress.

At that time, as now, there was a universal demand from all parts of the country for trust legislation. To meet and quiet this feverish excitement and feeling the Judiciary Committee of this House, responding or attempting to respond to this demand, reported a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution purporting to extend and enlarge the powers of Congress to enable us to further legislate upon this subject; and at that time it was maintained and asserted upon the floor of this House and elsewhere by Republicans that they were powerless to enact any further effective legislation against the trust evil until further power was conferred upon Congress to do so; that they had already gone to the full limit of their constitutional authority. They not only took this position and attempted to defend it here upon the floor, but repeated the same arguments throughout the country in the campaign of 1900.

They occupied the strange, if not anomalous, position of contending that Congress had exhausted all of its constitutional prerogatives, but at the same time the same committee that reported this resolution had reported to this House a bill, known as the Littlefield bill (H. R. 10539), proposing amendments to the Sherman antitrust law of July 2, 1890, which was reported by the Committee on Rules to the House, to be taken up and considered under the same rules and immediately after the disposition of the resolution proposing such constitutional amendment. In one breath our trust-bursting friends said they had exhausted all power vested in Congress to further legislate and in the next advocated an amendment to the Sherman law to aid and strengthen it. This was the political fiasco they played at that time, and they are now rehearsing for the same dramatic performance.

The Democratic minority at that time said and contended upon this floor that Congress yet possessed ample power under the Constitution to legislate against trusts, and insisted that the proposed amendment to the trust law did not go to the full extent of our authority and was wholly insufficient to meet the exigencies of the situation. They proposed many of the amendments thereto which they now propose to the present bill. All of these amendments were then defeated by a strictly party vote, as they doubtless will be again. The constitutional proposition failed to receive the necessary two-thirds vote in the House and was defeated. The proposed amendment to the Sherman law, as contained in the Littlefield bill, was warmly supported by every Democrat in the House, and, after proposing numerous amendments as suggested and being defeated in the adoption of these, unanimously voted for the bill as reported by the committee, as they now propose to do for this bill, and the same was passed by substantially a unanimous vote.

This bill was sent over to the Senate, where it was put to sleep and was never afterwards heard of. It was at that time predicted by Democrats that the Republican party never intended to permit even that small boon of relief to come to the people. How well they prophesied subsequent events have demonstrated. May we not indulge the hope that the Republican majority in the present instance are actuated by more candor and sincerity than heretofore.

Mr. Chairman, when these measures were pending before this House in the closing days—I may say hours—of the Fifty-sixth Congress I had the honor of submitting some remarks in the debate upon those measures, and it occurs to me that they are peculiarly appropriate to this discussion, and I therefore incorporate a part of what I then said in my remarks upon this occasion:

In the House of Representatives, Friday, June 1, 1900. The House having under consideration the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 138) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. ZENOR said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The House joint ,esolution 138, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and House bill 10539, to amend an act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890, having been reported by the Judiciary Committee, with special rules for their consideration, are now pending to be taken up, considered, and disposed of under a most extraordinary procedure, considering the importance of the questions involved.

Mr. Speaker, the concurrent submission of these two important propositions at the very close of the present session of this Congress has not been the result, in my judgment, of accident. That two such important measures should be held up during this long session and not even reported to this House until after the majority had presented and passed a resolution fixing the date of adjournment within six days from the time of their submission, and then accompanying their presentation with most drastic rules, is in the nature of a deathbed confession, and is, to say the least, very significant and conclusive evidence that this is a part of a well-considered and deliberately planned scheme of the Republican party to secure some mean partisan advantage of the political situation. Not that they mean to be serious or in earnest in this effort to deal with the evils of monopoly, trusts, and their allied interests, but to square themselves, if possible, with the country upon this most important question.

It is perfectly obvious to the most unthinking that unless the party charged with the responsibility of the present Administration initiate some move—take some steps, raise some cry against existing trust evils—looking toward the control in some way of these gigantic law-defying institutions before the adjournment of this Congress, that they will have no answer to make to the rank and file of their party and the people of the United States when confronted in the coming campaign with the charge of their duplicity and subserviency. Hence this precipitate action upon the part of the Republican party, through its leaders, the majority of this House. In order, however, that it may be understood under what rules these measures are being considered and the arbitrary manner in which the minority are denied all right to present any kind of motion to amend, modify, change, or alter in any way the constitutional amendment pending, and to force a vote thereon in the exact form in which the majority has reported it, I desire to print in my remarks the rules as reported. They read as follows:

"The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred House resolution No. 273, have had the same under consideration and report the following as a substitute therefor:

"Resolved, That House joint resolution 138, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, be made the special order in the House and taken up immediately on the adoption of this order; that general debate shall continue during the day and during a night session from 8 to 10.30 o'clock, and until 5 p. m. Friday, June 1, when the previous question on the resolution and amendments thereto reported from the committee to its final passage shall be considered as ordered, and the vote taken thereon without delay or intervening motion.

"That the bill (H. R. 10539) to amend an act entitled 'An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies,' approved July 2, 1890, be made the special order in the House and taken up immediately after the disposition of said House joint resolution 138; that general debate thereon be limited to one hour, thirty minutes on each side, and that the same be then considered under the five-minute rule as in the Committee of the Whole until 4 o'clock p. m. of Saturday, June 2, when the previous question on the bill and pending amendments shall be considered as ordered and the final vote taken; that at the opening of the general debate on House joint resolution 138 the amendments to H. R. 10539, proposed on the part of the minority in their views as filed, shall be read from the Clerk's desk and considered as pending when the vote is taken on said bill H. R. 10539, the time occupied in such reading not to be taken from the time of any member; that all members have leave to print upon such measures or either of them within five days after final vote taken.

"This rule shall not interfere with the consideration of conference reports."

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania has explained the object of the rules and the effect of their adoption. It will thus be seen that the design of these rules as reported by the committee and adopted by the majority vote of this House is to bring the House to a vote upon the amendment as presented by the majority of the Judiciary Committee, and deny to the minority or to anyone the right to offer any amendment thereto, although amendments have been prepared and presented, and if accepted by the majority or adopted by the House would doubtless secure the passage of this proposed amendment without opposition from the minority.

But it seems it does not suit the arbitrary purpose of the majority nor subserve their interests to permit any suggestions to be made by the minority in framing this important amendment. A proposed amendment to the organic law—the Constitution of the United States—which has up to this time been held so sacred that for more than one hundred years of our history it has not been deemed wise or expedient to amend, except to meet changed conditions, the result of a civil war and bloody revolution, and to secure the results of that civil conflict. It would seem to occur to ordinarily fair and conservative minds that a proposition of such transcendent importance to the people, and of such far-reaching consequences, that debate with the right of amendment should be most liberal, indeed should be given the widest possible range, with the opportunity to exploit all vulnerable points and wisely and judiciously shape, strengthen, and perfect the same with a view to the promotion of the best interests and general welfare of the whole people.

If it be claimed that the session is drawing to a close and the exigencies of the public business will not admit of more time, then it becomes necessary to explain why it was that a matter of such vital moment should have been delayed until such a late hour or why this session might not be prolonged. No adequate excuse can be found. No reason can be assigned for such unreasonable action. But whatever excuse or reason may be offered, whether satisfactory or otherwise, the fact remains that we are now confronted with these two most important measures of legislation, and we are compelled to meet them. We do not shrink from the task. The good faith of Republicans has been challenged, if not by their own action, by the newspapers of the country of both political parties, as well as the independent organs. They understand the situation. The independent, as well as party organs, have all characterized the effort now being put forth by the dominant party in respect to this proposed amendment, and they all unite in saying the only object is to make and accumulate cheap political party capital. Your purpose is transparent and will fail.

Mr. Speaker, I undertake to say that if the Republican party think they can deceive the country by this pretense of hostile legislation against trusts they underestimate the intelligence of the American people, and instead of deceiving them they will deceive themselves. It will not be forgotten that when the present Administration was inaugurated, after the party now in power had won the contest of 1896 and elected their President upon the money question, as they claimed, they came into control of the Government on the 4th day of March, 1897, and since that day have had control of both branches of Congress. Within eleven days from that time the President convened Congress in extraordinary session for the avowed purpose, as set forth in the President's message, of repealing the then existing law and passing a new revenue law. Notwithstanding you had won at the ballot-box in the contest of the preceding year upon the monetary issue, yet that question was not put forward or in any manner referred to as important in that message, and Congress was convened to legislate upon the tariff.

The sole result of that session was the passage of what is known as the "Dingley bill." That legislation, in my opinion, has done more to breed, foster, and propagate trusts than any other one act put upon the statute books in our history. That was the first session of the Fifty-fifth Congress. That entire Congress of three sessions passed out of existence and into history and not a single measure was introduced or step taken by the party to legislate in restraint of trusts or protect the country from their injurious effects. The present Congress assembled in December last and, more than six months having elapsed, now, in the expiring hours of the session, within six days of the date fixed for adjournment, the dominant party presents this body with a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution and a bill to amend the existing antitrust law, known as the Sherman Act. This proposed amendment to the Constitution is embodied in the following language:

"SECTION 1. All powers conferred by this article shall extend to the several States, the Territories, the District of Columbia, and all territory under the sovereignty and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

"SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to define, regulate, prohibit, or dissolve trusts, monopolies, or combinations, whether existing in the form of a corporation or otherwise.

"The several States may continue to exercise such power in any manner not in conflict with the laws of the United States.

"SEC. 3. Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of this article by appropriate legislation."

It will thus be seen that the first section of this proposed amendment announces a new departure in the doctrine of constitutional law, a new rule of construction. Heretofore throughout all our history no authority has yet been found, and no necessity supposed to exist, to justify this new, novel, and extraordinary phraseology in a constitutional amendment declaring it should extend to operate and have effect in the several States, the Territories, the District of Columbia, and all territory under the sovereignty and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. Not until the exigencies growing out of the imperial policy adopted by the Republican party demanded was this dangerous and revolutionary interpretation of the organic law ever thought to be necessary to exploit the force and effect of a constitutional provision. This theory, so cunningly devised and ingeniously framed in this proposition, is the reiteration of the same startling doctrine advanced by the dominant party in their contention in support of the Porto Rican tariff. It is the position the Republican party has assumed since it repudiated "our plain duty."

The majority of this House and the leaders of the Republican party in their rash and inconsiderate zeal to lay the foundation of a policy of European colonization by forcible annexation here in this country; to set the pace for subsequent legislation in relation to our new possessions, made the mistake of undertaking to convince the American people that the Constitution did not extend to our Territories of its own force; that this instrument only went where Congress said or might say it should go; that the Constitution and flag were inseparable parts of each other in the States, but that the flag was greater and possessed more vitality and expanding power than the Constitution; that it could go to Porto Rico, the Philippines, or anywhere beyond the confines of the States and remain there without Congressional aid or sanction, but that the Constitution remained at home under the guardianship of the Republican party and subject to its arbitrary will, to be projected here and there as best subserved to the political whims or partisan caprice of that party; that under the views now held by the leaders of the Republican party—I say leaders advisedly, for I do not believe that the great mass of the rank and file share these un-American ideas—the supreme and paramount law of the land, the great charter of American liberty and constitutional government has no permanent abiding place, no fixed and definite meaning, no well-defined and clearly drawn limitations and restrictions upon the powers of the Congress of the United States; that under this fundamental and hitherto supposedly all-pervading law of the land, no obligations, no prohibitions or restrictions are imposed upon the right and power of Congress to legislate and govern territory lying beyond or outside of the limits of the organized States of this Union, or restraining power to guide and control the arbitrary will of Congress in the enactment of laws for the government of the people of such possessions. The assumption and exercise of such power was for the first time in our history employed in the Porto Rican tariff legislation, but recently enacted by this present Congress, by which it was demonstrated that under this Republican theory of the Constitution Congress can levy and assess tariff duties and taxes against our own people, if they have the misfortune of residing within a Territory or dependent possession, without their consent or representation.

Such a theory and doctrine was so revolutionary and revolting to the minds of men accustomed to reading the pathetic story of heroic sacrifice from Bunker Hill to Yorktown that the Republican party found itself in an attitude of hostility to the almost universal sentiment of the people. Finding itself in this situation, and realizing that something heroic must be done in extremis to recoup some of the advantages they had lost and realign their party with public sentiment, it is not and will not be a great surprise to the country, and the country will thoroughly understand, that the alert and ever sagacious and masterful genius of Republican leadership should seize upon some favorable opportunity to create for their party some plausible excuse and justification for their course and failure to legislate for the relief of the country against trusts.

The apology they now offer is the suggestion of a remedy in which they have no confidence, and which they well know will never pass, and was not so intended when it was reported—a remedy by way of a constitutional amendment requiring a two-thirds majority in both branches of Congress to propose and three-fourths of the States to ratify before it can in any event become a part of the organic law. When it is remembered that the ratification by thirty-four States of the Union is essential to make effective the proposition now being considered, even admitting the possibility of its ultimate success, everyone who is honest and sincere and earnestly desires the immediate application of some effective and wholesome legislation against trusts must admit that the remote and far-off remedy by constitutional amendment is not the remedy sought by the appeals of the trust victims of the country, if there exists any other.

Mr. Speaker, I contend, and the Democratic minority in this House contends, that Congress now has ample power under the Constitution to legislate effectively to destroy every trust, illegal combination, and monopoly that today menaces the public interests and threatens the public weal. There is scarcely an honest pretense made, and certainly no convincing arguments advanced by the proponents of this resolution, that all power under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution has been exhausted by the law enacted July 2, 1890, known as the Sherman antitrust law—a law I desire to remind our Republican friends that was supported by every Democrat of the House who voted, as the records show. This is the much-vaunted Republican law that is now claimed to have exhausted the power of Congress to legislate against trusts, so frequently referred to in argument in this discussion, as the ground and only excuse our Republican friends have for insisting upon the necessity of this amendment. They claim that having gone to the full limit of Federal legislation upon this subject in the Sherman law, and the provisions of that law having proved inefficient to suppress trusts and afford the people adequate relief, that therefore they must have additional power, and this additional power must be granted by this proposed amendment, demanding of the States a surrender of all State jurisdiction over the subject and vesting in Congress absolute and exclusive power to deal with the questions involved.

This is a grave and serious proposition. Any proposition that involves the surrender by the States of the power and jurisdiction to govern and control their own domestic concerns and place that power beyond recall in the Federal Government, when addressed to a thinking and considerate man, must, it seems to me, cause him to hesitate and carefully pause before he can obtain his consent to commit himself to such a proposition and be willing to confer on Congress so vast a power. Such a vital and radical change in the organic law can only be justified, in my judgment, upon the clearest grounds of public necessity. It can never be excused or defended when sought in the interest of some partisan advantage or political maneuver. Believing as I do, and as I believe the leaders of the dominant party as well as the country at large do, that there exists no present urgent necessity for any enlargement of the powers of Congress to effectively legislate against trust evils, and that this movement is an effort to shirk a pressing and imperative duty, I am therefore unable to give this resolution the sanction of my vote.

I firmly believe with the minority that Congress has ample power and jurisdiction under the Constitution as it now is, and if it will but employ and exercise those powers in the proper manner and right direction it will be enabled to legislate effectively to crush out of existence every unlawful combination, trust, and monopoly that now curses the land. If our Republican friends could be induced to recall a memorable utterance of their President, inseparably associated with the legislative history of this session and destined to project itself into the political literature and campaign parlance of the country in the near future, and would summon to their aid moral courage sufficient to obey its injunction, "it is our plain duty," they would find in this a speedy and ample remedy for all the evils with which we are now confronted growing out of trusts and criminal conspiracies. There are more remedies than one to meet these combinations.

Our Republican friends will not be able to divert public attention nor deceive the people by their clamor about constitutional amendments. They know, and the people understand, that these gigantic trusts and criminal conspiracies have been bred, fostered, and fed by class legislation, high protective tariffs, railroad rebates, financial laws, and bank monopolies. They know and understand that if the shelter under which they have been enabled to amass their mighty power and wealth is removed that it will prove a potential factor in their destruction. Under the present Administration and the operation of the Dingley tariff during the last three years there have been organized more trusts, aggregating more capital, than in all the previous history of the country. Up to November 30, 1899, there were organized over 200 corporate trusts and 65 principal, unincorporated trusts. During the present Administration six billions of property and "water" have been capitalized by different corporations, trusts, and combines.

Why, Mr. Speaker, it is said that in the single State of New Jersey, the home of the Attorney-General of this Administration, the fees and charges alone for recording and issuing certificates for the incorporation of these concerns have been sufficient to defray the entire expense of maintaining the public schools of the whole State of New Jersey. Not only the luxuries but most of the necessities of life in this country are to-day within the grasp of some gigantic trust or combine. From the farmer's nail to the last article in his catalogue of supplies, from the swaddling clothes of the new born to the winding sheet of decrepit old age, all pay tribute and sacrifice to some mighty trust. Mr. Speaker, I have read in the public prints that during the last campaign in the State of Ohio a distinguished leader and chairman of the Republican national committee in some of his public addresses to the people of that State apologized for these trusts and excused their existence as the natural evolution of the phenomenal development of the business prosperity of this Administration.

The country, doubtless, well remembers with what luminous prophecy the campaign of 1896 abounded. Our Republican campaign orators from every stump fired the partisan zeal of their followers by portraying to the fancy in extravagant phrase and spectacular speech the marvelous transformation that would result from the success of their party. Surely the picture was not overdrawn if these political seers had in contemplation the abnormal growth and phenomenal development of criminal combinations, trusts, and conspiracies. If these were to be the symbols of Republican victory and types of that legitimate thrift, push, and energy that was to signalize the advent to power of the Republican party, then certainly the prophecy of our friends has been abundantly fulfilled. Nay, more. These hydra-headed monsters have by far outrun the most extravagant calculations of their friends, and have become so defiant, arrogant, and fearless that they now even threaten the overthrow of that party, unless some well-devised and tactical movement is initiated before the close of this session of Congress by its leaders to quiet the alarm and stay public sentiment.

To divert public attention from their failure to deal with this monstrous evil, and to deceive and delude the country, they now pretend that Congress has no further power to legislate to suppress these evils under the Constitution—as it now exists—and bring forward this proposition. They thereby hope to appear anxious and willing to do something for the relief of the people against trusts. They imagine that by proposing this amendment, however vicious and monstrous its provisions, the people will not stop to criticise or study their real purpose, but in their eagerness to rid themselves of the tyranny and oppression of the trusts, will array themselves in hostility to any party who may dare to oppose their suggestions or exploit their schemes. They hope to put—they imagine they will put their adversaries at a disadvantage before the American people by assuming an attitude of hostility to the trusts in such a way and manner that, however insincere and disingenuous they may be, and however impracticable and hopeless of success the methods employed, their opponents dare not challenge their sincerity or question those methods.

They forget that an intelligent, patriotic, and earnest people believe that in politics, as in everything else, "Honesty is the best policy," and I believe I do not misjudge their sentiment and temper when I say that I can and do repose a supreme reliance in the ability of the American people to recognize and appreciate upright motives, and to detect, censure, and condemn all manner of deception and fraud by whomsoever practiced. They will easily see and understand, as the public prints have already suggested, that a vote for this proposed amendment is a vote in faver of doing nothing against trusts. They will readily comprehend that a vote for this proposed amendment is an admission of the validity of the claim now made by the dominant party in excuse for their failure and refusal to enact legislation throughout all these years against the trusts. Every intelligent citizen knows that this is not true. The party itself here and now openly confesses that this is not true. The pending bill (Littlefield bill, No. 10539), concurrently reported with the pending joint resolution by the Judiciary Committee, is a solemn confession by the Republican party that they have not yet exhausted all constitutional power to further legislate against the trusts.

This very bill now pending, and to be taken up and considered by this House immediately after the vote upon this resolution, proposes several amendments to and enlarges the power and scope of the present existing antitrust law of July 2, 1890. It is the judgment of many of the best-informed lawyers of the country, who have given this subject special study and attention, that the present existing antitrust law, with such additional amendments as are within the constitutional power of Congress to enact, will furnish ample and complete legal authority, when exercised concurrently with the power of the several States, to oust every illegal combination, trust, and monopoly that now afflicts the body politic. I am firmly persuaded to believe that with the additional legislation proposed in the Littlefield bill now pending and the amendments proposed thereto by the Democratic minority of the Judiciary Committee will, if passed by this House, furnish ample and complete Federal authority, when supplemented by proper State legislation, to control and dislodge the trust combines. And there is no doubt of the passage of this bill; both parties and the members of this House, regardless of politics, will support it.

I heartily approve of the amendments offered to the bill by the minority of the committee, as I know my Democratic colleagues do, and we sincerely hope they may receive the support of enough members on that side of the Chamber to adopt them. I trust this will be done because, in my judgment, they very much strengthen and render more effective the law. If, however, I and the minority of this House shall fail to realize our hope in this regard; if these amendments shall be defeated, I will then give my vote for the bill as the best that can be done at this time. But, Mr. Speaker, before I forget it, I wish to call attention to the further provision—section second of this proposed amendment. I have already alluded to the fact that a further and more serious objection to this proposition was the strong, emphatic, and sweeping language of this second section. For convenience I insert the full text of this amendment.

"ARTICLE XVI.

"SECTION 1. All powers conferred by this article shall extend to the several States, the Territories, the District of Columbia, and all territory under the sovereignty and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

"SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to define, regulate, prohibit, or dissolve trusts, monopolies, or combinations, whether existing in the form of a corporation or otherwise.

"The several States may continue to exercise such power in any manner not in conflict with the laws of the United States.

"SEC. 3. Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of this article by appropriate legislation."

This language is much more comprehensive, perhaps, than would occur to the casual reader without pausing to weigh and measure its full significance and far-reaching effect. It was the evident purpose of its author to vest practically absolute power and jurisdiction in Congress over the subject-matter of the proposed amendment. This will more clearly appear when considered in connection with that other provision of the Constitution which declares that—

"This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof * * * shall be the supreme law of the land, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

If, therefore, the proposed amendment as drawn shall become a part of the Constitution, no State could pass or enforce any law upon the subject of trust combinations and monopoly conspiracies not in harmony with the Federal laws, and State jurisdiction would be entirely subordinated to the Federal jurisdiction. This is the first time in our whole legislative history that it has been suggested, by way of constitutional amendment, to extend the Federal jurisdiction to the control of the domestic institutions of the States; the first proposed innovation upon our dual system of government; the first demand made upon the States for a surrender of those rights hitherto guarded with such jealous vigilance and care; another effort put forth to centralize more power in the Federal Government at the sacrifice of the States. Before consenting to such a grave step—such a vital and fundamental change in the distribution of the legislative powers of our Government—conservative and thinking men and lawmakers may well pause and deliberately reflect. In my opinion a proposition of such doubtful propriety and questionable wisdom should not be entertained in the absence of the most overwhelming and convincing reasons. They do not now exist. In fact, Mr. Speaker, it is my deliberate judgment, after the most careful thought I have been able to bestow upon this question, that the adoption of such a resolution as this, if otherwise desirable, would be to defeat the very purpose in view.

To withdraw from the States or destroy their power to legislate in aid of the suppression of trusts and transfer that power exclusively to the Congress would, in my humble opinion, be welcomed by the millionaire and multimillionaire trusts and combines of this country as the greatest concession ever yet made to their interests. The States are regarded by these interests as the most potential foes they have. They have up to this time, except in very few instances where they have completely surrendered to trust control as a matter of business, as in New Jersey, done more to restrain and cripple the trusts by their antitrust State laws and their honest and vigorous enforcement than all the Federal laws upon the statute book.

In the States of Texas and Arkansas they have literally rid their States of their operation and freed their people from their influence. No greater mistake could possibly be made than to deprive the States of their jurisdiction to deal with and control their own domestic concerns, including their power to regulate, control, and manage all corporations created under their authority and located within their respective boundaries; to prescribe the terms and conditions upon which foreign corporations may be permitted to do business within their jurisdictions. The trusts, their hired counsel and agents, are watching every move that is made. The people are impatient and demand some immediate, effective, and practical relief. Neither of these interests, in my judgment, believe any constitutional amendment necessary to accomplish the complete overthrow of the trust power. That if the power now vested in Congress is courageously exercised and appropriate laws passed within the scope of that power and vigorously enforced, it is the consensus of the most enlightened public opinion, in my judgment, that these public enemies of our country will be driven from their fields of operation.

It is not sufficient to answer that the Supreme Court has held that existing law does not and can not control manufacture or production except when and as they become a part of interstate commerce. The court was here discussing the distinction between manufacture or production and interstate commerce not only as abstract propositions but as related to each other and the point of time when an article passed from the control of the State and became a part of interstate commerce. In this very opinion, rendered by Chief Justice Fuller in the Knight case (156 United States, page 11) the court draws this distinction very clearly.

"Doubtless the power to control the manufacture of a given thing"—

He says—

"involves in a certain sense the control of its disposition, but this is a secondary and not the primary sense; and although the exercise of that power may result in bringing the operation of commerce into play, it does not control it, and affects it only incidentally and indirectly. Commerce succeeds to manufacture and is not a part of it. The fact that an article is manufactured for export to another State does not of itself make it an article of interstate commerce, and the intent of the manufacturer does not determine the time when the article or product passes from the control of the State and belongs to commerce. * * *

"It is true that the bill alleged that the products of these (sugar) refineries were sold and distributed among the several States, and that all the companies were engaged in trade or commerce with the several States; but this was no more than to say that trade and commerce served manufacture to fulfill its function. Sugar was refined for sale, and sales were probably made at Philadelphia for consumption, and undoubtedly for resale by the first purchasers throughout Pennsylvania and other States, and refined sugar was also forwarded by the companies to other States for sale. Nevertheless it does not follow that an attempt to monopolize or the actual monopoly of the manufacture was an attempt, whether executory or consummated, to monopolize commerce, even though, in order to dispose of the product, the instrumentality of commerce was necessarily invoked."

This decision was made under the provisions of the present Sherman antitrust law of 1890. The court further says in this same opinion that—

"It can not be denied that the power of a State to protect the lives, health, and property of its citizens, and to preserve good order and the public morals, 'the power to govern men and things within the limits of its dominion,' is a power originally and always belonging to the States, not surrendered by them to the General Government, nor directly restrained by the Constitution of the United States, and essentially exclusive.

"The relief of the citizens of each State from the burden of monopoly and the evils resulting from the restraint of trade among such citizens was left with the States to deal with, and this court has recognized their possession of that power even to the extent of holding that an employment or business carried on by private individuals, when it becomes a matter of such public interest and importance as to create a common charge or burden upon the citizen; in other words, when it becomes a practical monopoly, to which the citizen is compelled to resort and by means of which a tribute can be exacted from the community, is subject to regulation by State legislative power. On the other hand, the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several States is also exclusive. The Constitution does not provide that interstate commerce shall be free; but, by the grant of this exclusive power to regulate it, it was left free, except as Congress might impose restraints."

He also says:

"That which belongs to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the United States, but that which does not belong to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the police power of the State."

And—

"The argument is that the power to control the manufacture of refined sugar is a monopoly over a necessary of life, to the enjoyment of which by a large part of the population of the United States interstate commerce is indispensable, and that, therefore, the General Government, in the exercise of the power to regulate commerce, may repress such monopoly directly and set aside the instruments which have created it. But this argument can not be confined to necessaries of life merely, and must include all articles of general consumption.

"Doubtless the power to control the manufacture of a given thing involves in a certain sense the control of its disposition, but this is a secondary and not the primary sense; and although the exercise of that power may result in bringing the operation of commerce into play, it does not control it, and affects it only incidentally and indirectly. Commerce succeeds to manufacture and is not a part of it. The power to regulate commerce is the power to prescribe the rule by which commerce shall be governed, and is a power independent of the power to suppress monopoly. But it may operate in repression of monopoly whenever that comes within the rules by which commerce is governed or whenever the transaction is itself a monopoly of commerce."

In this same case, on page 25, Mr. Justice Harlan remarks:

"But a general restraint of trade has often resulted from combinations formed for the purpose of controlling prices by destroying the opportunity of buyers and sellers to deal with each other upon the basis of fair, open, free competition. Combinations of this character have frequently been the subject of judicial scrutiny, and have always been condemned as illegal because of their necessary tendency to restrain trade. Such combinations are against common right and are crimes against the public. To some of the cases of that character it will be well to refer."

And at page 24 says:

"If it be true that a combination of corporations or individuals may, so far as the power of Congress is concerned, subject interstate trade, in any of its stages, to unlawful restraints, the conclusion is inevitable that the Constitution has failed to accomplish one primary object of the Union, which was to place commerce among the States under the control of the Common Government of all the people, and thereby relieve or protect it against burdens or restrictions imposed, by whatever authority, for the benefit of particular localities or special interests."

And again he says:

"In my judgment the General Government is not placed by the Constitution in such a condition of helplessness that it must fold its arms and remain inactive while capital combines, under the name of a corporation, to destroy competition, not in one State only, but throughout the entire country, in the buying and selling of articles—especially the necessaries of life—that go into commerce among the States. The doctrine of the autonomy of the States can not properly be invoked to justify a denial of power in the National Government to meet such an emergency, involving, as it does, that freedom of commercial intercourse among the States which the Constitution sought to attain."

And again, at pages 44 and 45:

"We have before us the case of a combination which absolutely controls, or may at its discretion control, the price of all refined sugar in this country. Suppose another combination, organized for private gain and to control prices, should obtain possession of all the large flour mills in the United States; another, of all the grain elevators; another, of all the oil territory; another, of all the salt-producing regions; another, of all the cotton mills; and another, of all the great establishments for slaughtering animals and the preparation of meats. What power is competent to protect the people of the United States against such dangers except a national power—one that is capable of exerting its sovereign authority throughout every part of the territory and over all the people of the nation?"

Mr. Speaker, according to the views expressed by Judge Harlan, he does not seem to be in harmony with the position assumed by the majority of this House. He seems to think that the General Government is not placed by the Constitution in such a condition of helplessness that it must fold its arms and remain silent while capital combines, under the name of a corporation, to destroy competition, not in one State only, but throughout the entire country, in the buying and selling articles that go into commerce among the States. This eminent judge does not question the power of the General Government under appropriate legislation to cope with the trust problem. He makes no suggestion of the necessity of a constitutional amendment to confer additional power upon Congress to accomplish the desired end. Hence I take it that no such resort is demanded.

But, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call brief attention to the situation with reference to House bill 10539, proposing amendments to the Sherman antitrust law of July 2, 1890, and the attitude of the minority of the Judiciary Committee and of this House in relation to the same. It seems the committee divided somewhat along political lines, it is true, not upon the main propositions involved, but the difference has arisen as to the extent and scope of the proposed amendments. The majority assert that the bill reported by them with amendments which they recommend go to the full limit of their constitutional authority upon this question, while the minority contend that such bill and amendments do not exhaust the full power of Congress over the subject, and report and recommend the adoption of several additional amendments making the law still more sweeping and drastic in its provisions.

Now, while I am not fully prepared to determine with absolute confidence the merits of this contention, yet I am fully prepared to say that I am perfectly willing to go to the utmost limits of constitutional power in amendments to this law to meet the emergencies of the present situation, and no gentleman upon this floor will in my opinion be excused or escape just censure from the people for doing less. If anything was needed to emphasize the importance of the situation and the imperative duty of this hour, it is the universal demand coming from every quarter and section, from every home and hamlet, from every business avocation and enterprise throughout the land, calling for substantial, effective, and immediate relief from the remorseless grasp of these heartless and soulless monsters of commercial greed and organized robbery, who stalk the streets of our great commercial centers and highways of trade as fearless and arrogant as they are soulless and heartless. I, for one, shall not stop to split hairs about nice technicalities of constitutional power in dealing with this subject, as our friends upon the other side have not done upon several other occasions in dealing with Porto Rico and our newly acquired possessions. I am willing for once to join them in going to the doubtful verge, and if they are as courageous in this emergency as they have been in the recent past to suppress this all-pervading evil, I have but little fears that this House will adopt all these amendments. I fear, however, they will not follow in this instance where duty and patriotism lead, for already the leaders upon that side of the Chamber are giving out evidences of their failing courage as they face the real thing.

It seems one thing to defy constitutional limitations when you come to deal with a helpless and impotent people across the waters, and quite a different thing to deal with organized greed and trust magnates on this side. Here you are strict constructionists of the old-fashioned Democratic school; there you are latitudinarians of the most pronounced and dangerous type. I shall support these amendments offered by the minority, and if the sincerity of our Republican friends is equal to their pretended zeal in fighting the trusts they, too, will support them, and thereby make this law what it ought and should be. If defeated in this, I will, as suggested, still support the original bill with the majority amendments. That these minority amendments may be understood and their merits judged of, I wish to insert them as part of my remarks. They are as follows:

"Amend the new section 9 as reported by the committee as follows: Strike out all after figure 9 in said section and amend it so as to read as follows:

"'SEC. 9. That every corporation, association, joint-stock company, or partnership formed or made, or managing or carrying on its business, in whole or in part, for the purpose of controlling or monopolizing, or in such manner as to control or monopolize, or tend to control or monopolize, the manufacture, production, or sale of any article of commerce or merchandise intended for interstate commerce or commerce with foreign countries, or for the purpose of controlling or increasing or decreasing the cost or price of the same to the purchaser, user, or consumer thereof, for the purpose of preventing, or in such manner as to prevent, competition, or of preventing competition in the manufacture, production, or sale thereof, is, for the purposes of this act, hereby declared to be illegal and a monopoly; and all such corporations, associations, joint-stock companies, and partnerships, and their officers, agents, managers, and attorneys, are hereby forbidden and prohibited from shipping or putting in transit any such article of commerce or merchandise to any State, Territory, foreign country, or place outside the State, Territory, or place in which it was manufactured or produced, and from selling or offering to sell any such article or merchandise to be so shipped or put into any such transit, unless for the private or personal use of the consignee; and for any violation of this provision shall be deemed guilty of an offense against the United States, and on conviction shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and by imprisonment not less than thirty days nor more than six months.

"'All such corporations, associations, joint-stock companies, and partnerships as above declared illegal shall be, and hereby are, forbidden and prohibited the use of the United States mail in aid or furtherance of any such business or purposes, and all laws now in force for the prevention of the fraudulent use of the mails, so far as the same may be applicable, shall apply in the execution of such prohibition.

"'Any such corporation, association, joint-stock company, or partnership may be proceeded against at the suit of any person or persons, or corporation, or association, or by and in behalf of the United States, and perpetually enjoined and restrained from doing or carrying on any interstate or foreign commerce whatever, either with the States or the Territories of the United States or the District of Columbia, or any foreign country; and no article of commerce produced, or manufactured, or owned and dealt in by any such corporation, association, joint-stock company, or partnership so organized, formed, managed, or carrying on business, shall be transported or carried without the State or Territory in which produced or manufactured, or in which same may be, or without the District of Columbia if produced, manufactured, or found therein, by any individual, corporation, or common carrier, in any manner whatever. All such articles of commerce, shipped in violation of the provisions of this act, shall be forfeited to the United States, and may be seized by any marshal or deputy marshal of the United States, or by any person duly authorized by law to make such seizure, and when so seized shall be condemned by like proceedings as those provided by law for the forfeiture, seizure, and condemnation of property imported into the United States contrary to law.'"

"SEC. 11. That every contract, combine, device, trust, or combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, tending to create a monopoly in the manufacture, production, sale, exchange, transportation, or dealing in any article of commerce or merchandise, entering into trade or commerce among the States or with foreign countries, or designed to create impediments to, or resulting in restrictions to, such trade or commerce or aids to commerce, or to limit or to control the manufacture or production of such articles or merchandise, for the purpose of increasing or decreasing, or operating in such manner, or with such result, as to increase or decrease the price of such article or merchandise to the user or consumer, for the purpose of preventing competition in the manufacture, production, sale, exchange, transportation, or dealing in such articles or merchandise, or to give power to charge unreasonable prices for merchandise or articles produced or manufactured to be bought, sold, exchanged, dealt in, or transported in such trade or commerce, or for the purpose of imposing, or in such manner as to impose, unjust or onerous restrictions upon, or impediments to, the lawful business of any person, company, or corporation engaged in the production or manufacture of such merchandise or articles, is hereby declared to be illegal and a monopoly within the meaning of this act, and every person who shall make, or enter into, or engage in, any such contract, combine, device, trust, or combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, or shall be a promoter thereof or officer or agent therein, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 and not exceeding $5,000 and by imprisonment not less than six months and not exceeding one year."

A new section 12, as follows, viz:

"SEC. 12. That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that the price of any commodity or article of merchandise has been enhanced in consequence of any monopoly as defined in this act, he shall issue his proclamation suspending the collection of all customs duties or import taxes on like articles of merchandise or commodities brought from foreign countries. Such suspensions shall continue as long as such enhancement in price of such commodity or article of merchandise exists, and until revoked by the proclamation of the President."

A new section 13, as follows, viz:

"SEC. 13. That whenever any State or Territory shall, in any law against trusts, combines, combinations, or monopolies, provide that no foreign corporation, association, joint-stock company, or partnership, or stockholder, member, or officer belonging to or interested in any such trust, combine, monopoly, or combination of any kind, shall be permitted to carry on or do any business, or have any office or place of business, in such State, or shall make provision to regulate or suppress the business of any such corporation, association, or partnership, or prohibit the sale or offering for sale in such State of any article or merchandise produced by it, every such corporation, association, or partnership carrying on, or attempting to carry on, or do any business or have any office or place of business therein, and all its articles or merchandise carried thereto, shall be subject to the operation and effect of such law, to the same extent and in the same manner as though it had been incorporated, organized, or formed in such State and such articles or merchandise had been made and not brought therein; and no such law shall be regarded as in any way trenching upon the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States or with foreign nations: Provided, however, That such articles or merchandise may be shipped and transported into any such State or Territory for the personal and private use of the consignee."

A new section 14, as follows:

"SEC. 14. That every corporation, association, joint-stock company, or partnership in the United States, or any Territory thereof, or in the District of Columbia, whether organized or formed under and pursuant to the laws of the United States or of a State or of a Territory, owning or controlling any plant or business, or a majority of the stock in any plant or business, similar to its own, in any other State, Territory, or place outside of the one in which it was first chartered, organized, or formed, shall, before being permitted to ship, consign, take, carry, or transport, or sell or deliver for shipment, to any other State or Territory, or into or from the District of Columbia, or any foreign country, any article of commerce or merchandise of its own production or manufacture, or receive consignments or shipments of articles of commerce or merchandise, manufactured or produced in any other State or Territory, or in the District of Columbia, or any foreign country, file in the office of the Secretary of State of the United States a certified copy of its articles of incorporation, association, or partnership, together with a duly verified statement showing the article or articles or merchandise manufactured, produced, or dealt in by it or intended to be manufactured, produced, or dealt in by it; a copy of its by-laws, rules, and regulations; the names and places of residence of its officers and stockholders; the amount of its capital stock and the amount thereof actually issued; the amount thereof actually paid in in cash; the nature and value of the property owned by it, and also a full statement of all its debts and liabilities; the number of its employees and wages paid; the dividends paid, if any; the amount of its surplus, if any; the character of additions and improvements made each year and the cost thereof, and a statement of its operating and other expenses, together with a balance sheet showing its profits and losses; and shall annually thereafter file in said office a report, verified by a majority of the directors of a corporation, or by a majority of the members of an association, joint-stock company, or partnership, showing the same facts as then existing, and shall, before shipping, or offering or attempting to ship, or sell or deliver for shipment, or put in the way for transit, to any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or any foreign country, any article of commerce or merchandise manufactured, produced, or dealt in by it, plainly and conspicuously stamp thereon, when susceptible of being so stamped, and also on the outside of packages, boxes, or tanks containing the same, the name of the article or merchandise, and the name of the corporation, association, joint-stock company, or partnership manufacturing, producing, or dealing in the same, and the place from and to which it is to be shipped or transported.

"Every such corporation, association, or partnership as referred to in this section, and every officer, agent, or attorney thereof, that shall ship, or offer or attempt to ship, or sell or deliver for shipment, or put in the way of transit, to any other State or Territory, or to the District of Columbia, or to any foreign country, any article or merchandise dealt in, manufactured, or produced by it, or shall violate or fail to comply with any of the provisions of this section, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 and not exceeding $5,000, and by imprisonment of not less than six months and not more than one year."

Mr. Speaker, section 12, offered as one of these amendments, will give the relief that has been contended for several years should be given, not only by Democrats, but by many independent Republicans and some of the ablest and most influential of the Administration newspapers of the country. I quote upon this question an editorial of the Washington Post of March 23, in which it makes a short quotation from the Hartford Courant, both supporters of the present Administration and high protection in politics. The Post editorially uses this language:

[From the Washington Post, March 23, 1900.]

"CONGRESS AND THE TRUSTS.

"When the elections of 1898 had assured Republican ascendency in both Houses of the Fifty-sixth Congress, the Post mentioned as one of the important duties that would devolve upon that body the accomplishment of some practical antitrust legislation. It was evident then, and it has become more apparent every day since that time, that the trusts would be one of the leading issues of the Presidential campaign. The Post suggested then, and has ever since persistently urged the necessity of depriving monopolistic combinations of any chance for shelter behind tariff schedules. As a consistent advocate of the doctrine of protection, the Post has protested and will continue to protest against its abuse. Attention has been called in these columns to trade combinations in protected industries that were and are stifling competition while paying large dividends on enormous overcapitalization. Testimony given before the Industrial Commission by managers of such combines convicts them of exploiting almost fabulous amounts of fictitious stock. Similar testimony shows that such combines sell their products all over Europe at lower prices than are charged for them to domestic consumers. These facts we have from time to time pointed out, and in the interest of the great principle of protection to which our marvelous development and splendid prosperity are largely due, the Post has advocated the reduction, not in all cases the destruction, of schedules thus outrageously abused.

"What is Congress going to do in order to put the Republican party in good form for the campaign? The President has called the attention of Congress to the trust evil and left to that body the duty of devising and applying such remedies as are in the scope of national legislation. It is admitted on all sides that some of the trusts are beyond the reach of national authority. It is admitted by all fair-minded men that there are some trade combines which have by legitimate means reduced the cost of production while increasing wages and not increasing prices. No indiscriminate warfare on trusts is called for. But against the sort of combines that are taking advantage of protective duties to prey on the public there is a remedy at hand, and every Congressman knows what it is.

"The Post has long looked and hoped for Republican cooperation in its effort to induce the Republicans in Congress to apply that remedial agency. There has been any amount of general denunciation of trusts in our Republican contemporaries, but until this date we have waited in vain for them to join us in advocating the only immediate and practical plan for relief. At last, however, we have the excellent company and good-fellowship of the Hartford Courant, a leading Republican journal in a State devoted almost exclusively to manufactures. That paper refers to and pointedly condemns the proposition of Judge Ray, of New York, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, to amend the Constitution in a new spot by tacking upon it an article delegating to Congress "the power to regulate and repress monopolies and combinations, to create and dissolve corporations, and dispose of their property."

"This attempt to utilize Mr. Bryan's abandoned thunder finds no favor with our Hartford contemporary. After cauterizing with ridicule, the Courant squarely plants itself alongside the Post with this plain declaration:

"'But if Judge Ray wants the strongest and heartiest support the Courant can give him, let him induce his friend and colleague, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, to bring forward a bill striking from the Dingley tariff every protective duty behind which one of the vicious trusts is known to be snuggling and bloating. That's a practical remedy, right at hand. Such a bill, if Judge Ray and his associates put their shoulders to it in earnest, can be rushed through the House and sent to the Senate before the end of next week.'

"The antitrust amendment device is too shallow to deceive anybody with sense enough to decline an invitation to buy a gold brick or go out as bagholder on a snipe-hunting expedition. The Post is bound to credit Judge Ray with such intelligence and general information as must render it impossible for him to believe that his edition of the Bryan recipe has a ghost of a chance for adoption. Where is there a single State that would be willing for its legislature to vote for it? But the tariff-reduction specific would reach the disease promptly. It is of the kind that 'attend strictly to business and don't go loafin' round.' Will Congress apply it to those enemies of protection, those rapacious ingrates whom the tariff shelters?"

This, Mr. Speaker, is but a sample of many other able editorials appearing in the columns of Republican organs throughout the country; and yet in the majority report of the Judiciary Committee reporting this bill, as well as by the distinguished chairman of that committee, Mr. Ray, of New York, and my distinguished colleague, Mr. OVERSTREET, from Indiana, upon the floor of this House, denounce and characterize this proposition as a vicious and malignant Democratic assault upon the protective system, and would, if adopted, ruin the business industries of the country. Such a proposition, they say, would not only afford no relief against the trust evil, but would establish free trade and prove disastrous to our industrial system.

Again, our friends lose their nerve and grow less and less heroic amid the conflict of contending interests. In the presence of an evil which they charge upon the floor of this House has outgrown the power of the States to successfully cope with, and which they denounce in the most unmeasured terms, it will hardly be accepted as satisfactory by the great body of intelligent citizens of this country to say that, notwithstanding the manufacture of an article that has become the subject of a trust under the operation of the protective "Dingley bill," it will not do to strike from the law the duty upon that article, because, perchance, it might strike a blow to a pet political system of the Republican party. As between an incalculable good to the great mass and a theoretical injury to the favored few, the Republican majority of this House do not hesitate to side with the favored few. A day of reckoning will come, and in the crucial test of public opinion you will be weighed and measured. It may be then that you will regret the decision you now make and the company you now choose.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this struggle is on and the contest will not cease until it shall be determined whether the people of this country are the sovereigns or the money power, trust combinations, and organized greed are to prove themselves masters. A free people will not willingly yield up their liberties and obsequiously consent to trusts and financial serfdom. They have already borne much with patience and may yet endure, but these, of all times, are full of wholesome warning to the rich and powerful not to abuse their wealth and power, but to obey and respect the laws of the land and aid and assist in their enforcement. No class of people have so much of interest in the maintenance and enforcement of law and order as the men of wealth and fortune. Upon the integrity of our legislative bodies, courts, and administrative officers depend the safety and security of person and property. As an evidence of the spirit of unrest and the trend of thought, even among the magnates and princes of Wall street, concerning the present situation, I quote what Mr. James R. Keene, of Wall street fame, is reported to have said a short time since:

"'The people of this country must arouse themselves. The coming election is of more importance, from the standpoint of a pure and true Americanism, than any that has transpired since the second election of Lincoln. Money is in the saddle; it is riding down the institutions of this country with a confident insolence that tells of its firm belief in its own invincibility. It is running the Government to-day in its every branch and arm.

"If money's power in molding public affairs goes forward for four years more as it has for four years past, the name of American liberty will only be worth a recollection as a matter of history. Money is pressing the people backward step by step. What is to be the end? If it goes on, there are, as matters trend, but two solutions. One is socialism, and the second is revolution. The American people must defend themselves from money just as they once guarded their forest frontiers from the savage. Unless they come solidly shoulder to shoulder for their rights, and come at once, Bunker Hill will have been a blunder, Yorktown a mistake."

Mr. Speaker, we believe we are right upon the question of this constitutional amendment. We believe that our friends upon the other side of this Chamber have not been candid, open, and frank in their advocacy of it. To show the lack of sincerity of some of the gentlemen upon that side of the Chamber, I will print as part of my remarks a clipping from a prominent newspaper what the distinguished leader and reputed mouthpiece of the Administration, Mr. GROSVENOR of Ohio, had to say just prior to the assembling of the present Congress in reference to the sufficiency of our antitrust laws, and the jurisdiction of the several States upon the subject of the control and restraint of trusts and corporations. It would seem from this published statement of the venerable statesman from Ohio that he at least would have been found joining hands with us in this controversy. Here is what the distinguished gentleman is reported to have said at that time:

"A REPUBLICAN VIEW.

"[By CHARLES H. GROSVENOR.]

"The Fifty-sixth Congress comes together under peculiar circumstances. The Republican majority is commissioned by the voice of the people to do certain things in any event, and to do certain other things if found to be wise and judicious.

"As to the things which the Republican majority has been commissioned to do:

"First, and most conspicuous of all, it has been delegated to revise the statutory financial condition of the country; that is to say, it has been decided by the people of the country, in the election of McKinley and the upholding of the platform at St. Louis, that the unwritten law of the Treasury, which for twenty years has paid gold upon every obligation of the Government, shall now be ordered by statute to continue that process. This is simply to enact into law the declaration of the Republican platform, which ordained the existing gold standard.

"When Congress shall have approved of this measure, either in the form it comes to the Senate or in such form as may afterwards be agreed upon, there will be no free and unlimited coinage of silver in this country for the next eight years in any event, because the Senate is absolutely sure to be against it during that period of time.

"While the Dingley bill has produced a great and gratifying return of revenue to the Treasury, there is yet, nevertheless, a demand that must be heeded, that there shall be economy in the public expenditures, needless expenditures must not be made, and many needful things must be postponed to a later and future day.

"As to trusts and combinations, it is my judgment, and I so said to a reporter of this paper some days ago, that the Sherman law of 1890, which was a Republican measure and which has now been put into full force and effectiveness by the Republican Administration, gives all the remedy needful in the control and overthrow of illegal trusts and harmful trusts which can be made by the action of Congress.

"This legislation, thus upheld by the Supreme Court, covers the whole ground of Congressional action, and all other laws should be enacted by the legislatures of the several States. I repeat what I said before: I am opposed to any interference by Congressional action with the right of the States to organize, create, control, limit, and regulate their own corporations in their own way, and for Congress to impair it by limitation upon the operation of State corporations other than that which was enacted in the interstate-commerce law would be such a violation of the right of States that it is not to be thought of for a moment."

Again, the Washington Post, while perhaps not a Republican organ, yet, as a general rule, supports the Administration, in an editorial appearing in its issue of May 31—the very day this measure was taken up in the House—had this to say upon the subject of this amendment and the Democratic position in relation thereto:

"By supporting this constitutional amendment Democrats would have deliberately connived at the permanent retirement of the trust issue, withdrawn it from the campaign, and thereby robbed their party of one of its most powerful engines of war."

I will publish the editorial as a portion of my remarks.

"DEMOCRATIC POSITION ON TRUSTS.

"Our Democratic friends in Congress are to be congratulated upon the attitude they have assumed toward the constitutional amendment proposed by the House Committee on the Judiciary, of which Hon. George W. Ray, of New York, is the chairman. Mr. Ray's proposition is obviously impracticable, and, as many believe, was intended to be so. By supporting it the Democrats would have deliberately connived at a virtually permanent retirement of the trust issue, withdrawn it from the campaign, and thereby robbed their party of one of its most powerful engines of war. They express their utter disbelief in the sincerity of any representative Republican effort to curtail the power of the trusts. It would have been, therefore, suicidal on their part to commit themselves to an arrangement most palpably calculated to serve the alleged purposes of their antagonists.

"There was still another serious objection, which is set forth in clause 3 of the resolution adopted by the Democratic caucus on Tuesday night:

"'3. We oppose and urge Democrats in Congress to vote against the constitutional amendment proposed by the Republican majority of the Judiciary Committee, unless amended by striking out section 1 thereof and adding thereto, in section 2, in lieu of these words: "The several States may continue to exercise such power in any manner not in conflict with the laws of the United States," the following: "Nothing in this article, nor any act of Congress in pursuance thereof, shall operate to abridge or impair any of the rights or powers held by any of the States prior to its adoption."'

"It seems to be the case, therefore, that the Democrats regarded the Ray proposition not only as a scheme to postpone, perhaps indefinitely, all governmental action against the trusts, and incidentally to entrap the Democrats into withdrawing the issue of the campaign of 1900, but also, in case the amendment should be finally adopted, as an abridgment of the rights and powers of the States. Certainly, holding such opinions, they could not have taken any course other than that referred to. Their present position, in this matter at least, seems to be unassailable."

Mr. Speaker, the present session of this Congress is now rapidly approaching its close. In looking back over the history of its seven months of legislation nothing will be found in the shape of relief to the great body of the people from the burdens of taxation, while the appropriations have grown and the expenses increased almost beyond calculation. Notwithstanding the country was assured by the late distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. Dingley, that the war-revenue bill, enacted as an emergency measure, would be repealed as soon as the war was over and peace declared, and notwithstanding that war ended now nearly two years ago, and many hundreds of petitions and memorials have flooded members of Congress from all parts of the country, praying for a repeal or modification of this onerous tax, and many bills have been introduced and referred to the proper committees, where they are still buried, asking for a repeal of this tax, in whole or in part, no sign or indication has ever been given of any hope or expectation of securing such repeal.

If no relief can be had by repeal of the war taxes, if the burdens of the people can not be lightened by any form of reduction in the exactions of taxation, let us at least go to the extent of performing a long-neglected duty, and place upon the statute book of the nation a law that will equalize in some degree the opportunities in life to meet these burdens—a law that shall be framed in the interests of the people, the whole people, adequate and sufficient in every respect to meet, overthrow, and outlaw in whatever phase or form they may present themselves every trust, combine, and conspiracy operating in restraint of trade and commerce and to the prejudice of free and open competition and the rights of the great mass of consumers throughout the country, and we will have then atoned for many sins of omission in the past. Not only this, Mr. Speaker, but when the law is ingrafted on the statute book let it be understood by those in authority that it is meant to be and must be enforced.

Much of the existing condition of things in relation to the growth, power, and insolence of these trusts is due to inefficient, corrupt, or subservient officials charged with the duty of prosecuting those dignified and well-to-do violators of the law. It requires no ordinary amount of legal ability and moral courage to face this class of criminals in a court of justice with a vigorous criminal prosecution. They are usually able to command, in addition to their high social and business standing in the community, not only the very best legal talent of the country, but too often the influence and sympathy of the political party of which they are members. And thus the difficulties and embarrassments multiply to overawe and prevent a successful prosecution.

This, Mr. Speaker, is no fancy. It is what has happened in many instances. Loud and bitter complaints have been heard all over the country of the fact that, if a poor unfortunate wretch is overtaken and brought within the punishing power of the law, though his offense may have the mitigating element of having been committed to appease his own hunger, or maybe that of his wife and little ones, he is certain to suffer the full penalty of the law, while the rich and well-to-do—the man who can organize a gigantic conspiracy to fleece and rob a nation—the Government official who can filch from the public a thousand, a hundred thousand, or maybe a million of dollars, according to his opportunities, challenges public sympathy, if not favor, and places himself in the "heroic rôle," and is often able to baffle and defeat the law; and if perchance he is arraigned at the bar of justice, if not acquitted, secures a comparatively light sentence—with the almost certain assurance of executive clemency and pardon, after short imprisonment if that should be a part of his punishment.

This sentiment, while much at fault, is not entirely without some grounds of support. Confidence in the courts and public officials charged with the responsibility of administering the laws of the country has ever been the chief reliance of our people for security and protection. It is one of the highest duties of government to faithfully execute all the laws—to exert all its legitimate functions and to secure an honest and upright administration of justice in a spirit of the utmost fairness and impartiality to all. That this has not been done with reference to our antitrust laws by the Republican party goes without saying.

The Trusts.

SPEECH

OF

HON. CHARLES W. THOMPSON,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 7, 1903,

On the bill (H. R. 17) requiring all corporations engaged in interstate commerce to file returns with the Secretary of the Treasury, disclosing their true financial condition, and of their capital stock, and imposing a tax upon such as have outstanding capital stock unpaid in whole or in part.

Mr. THOMPSON said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The great objection against the trusts, as they exist to-day, the great danger to the community which inheres in them consists in the inordinate degree of power which they have acquired and which in many cases they have grossly abused. So far as I know there is no disposition on the part of any public man or any body of public men to interfere with any legitimate employment of capital or any logical development of business enterprise. We hear a great deal about "trust busting" and "trust killing" and "octopus hunting," but these terms are made use of in a hyperbolical sense, after the manner of the usual current American phraseology. What is really meant is trust regulating and trust curbing, which is perfectly proper and desirable.

The fathers of the Republic and all our wise lawgivers and statesmen from the Revolution down to the present time were and always have been especially solicitous to guard the Republic from the encroachments of too powerful influences, tendencies, and institutions which might infringe upon the freedom and rights of the individual citizen. Thus it was that all laws and customs of the Old World tending to create or foster privileged classes or privileged individuals were carefully excluded from our system of government. Thus it was that the tendency to centralization of power in the General Government, to the detriment of State rights, was provided against in the Constitution. And so it has ever been until lately that the laws and their application have looked steadily toward the preservation of individual freedom and the preservation of the sovereignty of the individual citizen at all hazards. The Government also has always hitherto been held to be superior in power to any and all corporate or incorporate enterprises and institutions within its jurisdiction, however wealthy and important they may have been.

But now, within a few years, and before we have really had time to realize the fact, a power has grown up in this country which, without any exaggeration, seriously menaces the power of the individual freeman and citizen, and challenges, even if it does not threaten to overthrow, the power of the General Government. This new power is the trust power. Its growth and its startling rate of increase during the last few years only serves to show more plainly than was ever shown before the vast possibilities of the power of money. Of course, the power of money has always been acknowledged, but it is only recently that it has given proof, or at least very strong evidence, that a comparatively few men, with unlimited pecuniary resources at their disposal, can control practically the whole business of the country and dispose of the individual citizen in whatever manner they please, and can at least have the audacity to essay to control the lawmaking, the law-expounding and law-enforcing departments of the Government of the United States.

I know that there are many other strong arguments in favor of curbing the trusts, but I am more and more firmly convinced, the longer I think about it, that this is the strongest of all, namely, that it is dangerous, injurious, and intolerable for any men or any institutions to be allowed to possess such a degree of power in this country as the trusts now possess. A citizen, even if he is a rich man, has a right to call on the President, no doubt. A citizen, even if he is a benevolent billionaire, has a right to make use of the telegraph. But who would have ever dreamed a few years ago that Mr. Morgan would come down to Washington and, in company with prominent Republican leaders connected with Congress, go to see the President and endeavor to make him abandon his antitrust campaign?

Who would have ever dreamed that Mr. Rockefeller would actually send telegrams to Senators, not pleading against certain measures, but stating bluntly that they must abandon such measures as he and his Standard Oil trust friends frowned upon and disliked? But that is what it has come to at last. And if the veteran Senator from Massachusetts, so wise in his generation and so skilled in parliamentary practice, could justly resent the practice of Senators and Representatives in seeking Presidential influence in favor of their measures or against other measures, how much more right have the people of the country to resent such attempts of favored and powerful corporations to "bulldoze" the Government of the United States. Of course they have a right to resent it, and they do resent it.

It is surely time to call a halt to the progress of a development within this country when it has reached such a degree of power and shown a disposition and ability to exert its power in such ways as in the case of the trusts. I for one do not believe that the bills passed by either House at this session are sufficient to meet the exigency, and I believe, and regret to believe, that their operation when enacted into law will not be effective. But we are willing to adopt the plans proposed by our Republican brethren, believing that it would be impossible at this time, considering the influence which the trusts have with that party, to pass such legislation as is needed to give relief to the people.

The yoke is heavy and the burden is not light, and if the Republican party does not give relief very soon, I am constrained to believe that the great toiling masses who have borne these unjust burdens with so much fortitude and long-suffering will assert their rights as American citizens and sweep the Republican party and its allies, the trusts, out of power, and enthrone the original idea of our great and just Government by giving equal rights to all, and will take away those special privileges to the few which have been given and encouraged by the Republican party by its allegiance to the high protective tariff.

I am in favor of enacting any and all measures which look toward the abatement of the trust evils, even if those measures may be very inadequate for meeting the whole exigency. I fear, however, that our efforts as Congressmen and as citizens desiring the highest welfare of the country will be productive of little good results so long as the Republican party dominates the politics and the Government of the country.

I have great confidence in the honesty, integrity, and ability of my distinguished friend the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], the author of the bill now under consideration. I believe he could have framed a bill which would have been more far-reaching and more effective, and which would have given far greater relief to the people; but he feared his party would not indorse it, and he doubted its passage through the Senate, where it would inevitably meet the force of opposition from the great Republican leaders who are so closely identified with the trusts. I believe my friend the distinguished gentlemen from Maine to be a conscientious Representative of the people, and one who really desires to give ample relief to the people in this emergency, but unfortunately he has not the cooperation of his party on this question.

Is it not perfectly clear that the Republican party, as a party, and as represented by its party leaders, is in league with the trusts? Of course it is. Everybody knows it. It is as plain as the sun at noonday. The trust magnates are all Republicans because the Republicans aid them with their tariff schedules; and the Republicans aid them by keeping up their high tariff schedules because the trusts contribute liberally to the Republican campaign funds. Everybody understands this, and it is such an old story that a speaker ought almost to apologize to the House for using up time in telling it.

With the Republicans committed irrevocably to the tariff and the trusts what can one man do, even if he be President of the United States, to curb the trusts? In order to cope with this urgent necessity which now confronts the community it is first of all requisite that the Democrats should be restored to power in the executive and legislative branches of the Government. It is not the design of the Democratic party to legislate in a crude and violent manner against the legitimate and proper employment of capital. It is not the design of the Democrats to assault and uproot established business enterprises simply because they are of great dimensions. The recent great advances in commercial activity in the South, and the recent great multiplication and amplification of important business enterprises in that section, ought to be sufficient to convince the people of the United States that the commercial and industrial policy of the Democratic party, if in power, would be essentially conservative. But its history as a party would also prove that it would legislate in all things for the benefit of all classes of the community and for the equal rights of all citizens, and that it would steadfastly oppose all special privileges and all exhibitions of partiality toward certain classes of persons and industries.

I return to the thought with which I began, Mr. Speaker. Who can contemplate without apprehension the enormous power now wielded by the trusts? No one can do so unless he be a beneficiary of the trusts. It is well known that the statistics in regard to the trusts which have been generally relied upon are very inadequate and fall far short of the truth. It is a fact now ascertained beyond a doubt that the trusts actually now incorporated and in flourishing activity in this country number over 700, and that they embrace monopolies of hundreds of our most essential industries. Their capitalization runs up into the billions, no one knows how far, but in such large figures no one can realize the exact dimensions, even if they are precisely known. Suffice it to say that the trusts control to-day the great bulk of our industrial enterprises and comprise a large part, probably nearly one-half, of the entire wealth of the country. I submit that this is too much power to be suffered to concentrate in the hands of a comparatively few corporations and individuals. I submit that this power must be curbed forthwith; and I submit that this great and indispensable work can only be performed by a Democratic Administration and Congress.

Pure Food.

SPEECH
OF
HON. HERMAN B. DAHLE, OF WISCONSIN,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, December 19, 1902.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 3109) for preventing the adulteration, misbranding, and imitation of foods, beverages, candies, drugs, and condiments in the District of Columbia and the Territories, and for regulating interstate traffic therein, and for other purposes—

Mr. DAHLE said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The Committee on Interstate Commerce informs us through its report that it has had four different bills referred to it, all seemingly having the same object in view, and that after having carefully considered each of them, a majority of that committee are persuaded that the bill now before us will, if enacted into a law, best reach the object sought.

Section 1 of this bill proposes that the Secretary of Agriculture shall organize the Chemistry Division of the Department of Agriculture into a bureau of chemistry, which shall have direction of the chemical work of the present Division of Chemistry and of the chemical work of the other Executive Departments whose respective heads may apply to the Secretary of Agriculture for such collaboration, and which shall also be charged with the inspection of food and drug products as provided in the bill, and that such Secretary shall make necessary rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of the act under which the director of the bureau of chemistry shall procure from time to time and analyze or examine samples of foods and drugs offered for sale in original unbroken packages in the District of Columbia, in any Territory, or in any State other than that in which they shall have been manufactured or produced. And the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to employ such chemists, inspectors, and other employees as may be necessary.

The next section establishes penalty for the offense of this law.

In the next section it is provided that examination be made of specimens of foods and drugs offered for sale in unbroken packages such as come within interstate commerce, by the direction of the Bureau of Chemistry.

Also provides that prosecution for penalties named shall be instituted by proper United States district attorney upon certification of Secretary of Agriculture that any provisions of this bill have been violated. Next it is provided that it is the duty of every district attorney to whom the Secretary of Agriculture shall report any violation of this act to cause proceedings to be commenced and prosecuted without delay.

Mr. Chairman, it so happens that the place I was born in was a store with dwelling attached, where my father sold food, and continued in that business from such time until I was old enough to start in business for myself in the same line, and I am yet interested in that branch of trade, so that I, continuously up to the time I came here, have been in close contact with the consumer as well as manufacturer and jobber of food, and know from my long experience that there are ample grounds for the enactment of this kind of a law.

As a dealer in food as defined by this act, I will very much appreciate its passage personally, and for the people I represent. I know it will be accepted as a very good law by the large majority of the people I represent, and I feel the same is the case with the very large majority of all our people, whether they are located in the North, East, South, or West.

It will be a benefit first to the consumer who comprises all our people to a larger or smaller degree by prohibiting the sale of all articles of food products that are deleterious, and providing that all adulterated food and drugs shall be sold under their true names in such manner as to advise the purchaser of what he is getting. He will also be protected from purchasing that which is deleterious according to this bill when enacted.

And with such consumers whose taste or imagination can best be satisfied with such products as are manufactured abroad and imported the label or name will then be a security or guaranty.

The consumer who is poor, whose means are small, who must live as cheaply as possible and yet not sacrifice health, also the better to do of fair means, who wishes to live an economic life, will be benefited, because he may now subsist on that which is so poor as to be deleterious to health and life on account of the very inferior, decayed, mixed raw material used or poisonous ingredient added in such manufacture or preparation so that the product becomes deleterious.

He will also be benefited because food which is cheapened in such different ways as mixture and adulteration must then be marked as such and will be sold on its merits, except in cases where advertising may have some effect.

LOSERS.

Those who will lose by the enactment of this bill are the following:

First. All manufacturers or dealers in all articles the sale of which will be prohibited by this law because such articles are deleterious. I feel that the great majority of our people, the consumers as a class, will appreciate such restriction, and I feel that it is our duty to help them secure it.

Second. Manufacturers who have in many instances made undue profits by manufacturing, preparing, or canning what is now called pure food from animal, cereal, vegetable, or fruit raw product, which has been of such inferior quality or decayed so that the manufactured or prepared article is deleterious.

Third. Those who manufacture or prepare articles of food or drugs, included in this bill, marking, labeling, and offering such for sale as pure and of a high standard, while such may be adulterated or imitation under the name of another article, thereby taking advantage of the consumer, because such adulterated, mixed, or imitation article will yield the manufacturer a larger profit himself and dealer, because such manufacturer will also aim to so arrange his price to the dealer that he also may share in the larger profit to the loss of the consumer.

The one of the two dissenting members of the committee reporting this bill admits that legislation which will insure pure food and protection to the consumers is wise, but claims that such legislation should not embarrass the manufacturer of and dealer in pure food. If a part of the manufacturers of food did not resort to the use of improper raw material, and make the food of low strength, as stated, there might be no necessity of this requirement, but with conditions as they are it is necessary.

When you opponents of this measure claim that all that can be regulated which is involved in this bill by State officials through State laws better than by Government officials through the enactment of the act before us. Then I wish to call your attention to the very marked improvement in reaching the object sought by Government law enforced by Government officials over State officials in the oleomargarine manufacture and sale when the late Government law regulating the manufacture and sale of that product went into effect.

Before that time the unscrupulous manufacturer and dealer in that product made undue profits, taking undue advantage of the consumer by manufacturing, placing on the market, an imitation, much cheaper produced than the article it was made to imitate, placing same on the market and disposing of same for another product.

I do not find that the Government has any trouble in enforcing this law. The consumer who now wishes the genuine article can get such by paying the price it is worth, and the consumer of small means gets what he has to get along with at a proper price.

We keep our Army and Navy not for war but for peace, and so with the enactment of this bill, it will not be for war but for peace in the sense of the national law being effective where State laws are not in very many instances carried out.

The United States Agricultural Department is assisting and doing much good by experimenting in and studying the various branches of the great industry in which such a great army of our people are interested, viz, agriculture, and in conveying such results and knowledge gained by such experiments to such producers through "Farmers' Bulletins," published from time to time and distributed largely through members of Congress, such bulletins as each member will judge of most interest and benefit to the particular district he represents, being by him selected and distributed. These can also be obtained by individuals ordering same direct from this Department. I find that there are bulletins published on cattle, hogs, sheep, horses, poultry, fruit, vegetables, grain, pastures, grasses, soils, and many other subjects pertaining to agriculture. Another way this Department has of placing the results of its experiments and study before the producer in agriculture is by sending experts to attend farmers' conventions, and there teach the result of its labors and investigations. Wherefore, I conclude it wise and our duty to enact this bill into law, whereby we physically will be gainers. I trust that the majority of this Congress may look at the subject in the same light.

Union Station in the District of Columbia.

OF
HON. THETUS W. SIMS,
OF TENNESSEE,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, December 15, 1902.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and having under consideration the bill (S. 4825) providing for a union station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes—

Mr. SIMS said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: If I was to make the same statement that we have just heard made by the gentleman from Missouri, it would add no additional enlightenment to the House. If he will excuse me, I will embody his speech in mine and appropriate it. [Laughter.] It is well remembered by the members of the House that I opposed the former bill substantially for the same reason stated by the gentleman from Missouri. I was especially opposed to appropriating 14 acres out of the Mall and forever destroying the original and permanent plan for beautifying Washington City, while the railroads, as we remember, paid nothing for the 14 acres or any part of it.

That legislation is now existing law, providing for the building of two depots instead of one. I think the present legislation is far preferable to existing legislation, and while if this was an original proposition I would hesitate to support it, yet I believe it is much better than existing legislation; that it is my duty to favor the enactment of the proposed law. First, we get rid of an obstruction to the improvement of Washington as originally laid out and planned; second, we get a union station instead of two stations; third, we get a union station of magnificent beauty and value—a great permanent improvement.

I must admit that there are some equities existing in favor of the railroads that would not apply in an ordinary city. This is a passenger station, and not a freight station; and we all know that such a station would never be required by the mere necessities of a railroad going into an ordinary city for commercial purposes. We are requiring them to spend a sum of money far beyond what would be necessary for commercial business. I was unwilling to vote for $3,000,000 in the Senate bill, but I did agree to support this bill if the appropriation was cut down $1,000,000. I have not agreed, however, to bind myself not to vote for any amendment that I think is in the direction of public good and in the interests of the station.

Instead of hunting up my remarks in the RECORD made in this body on bringing in the conference report agreeing to the bills providing for the two stations, and giving the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company more than 14 acres out of the Mall for a depot site, I will read a report of same as published by the Evening Star, a newspaper then and now published in this city, which shows the position I then occupied regarding this question, from which it will appear that I have experienced no change of heart:

I want to appeal to this House to undo so far as it can, or fail to consummate what has already been done with the intent only to reject this report, to the end that the bill may be so amended as to leave out the 14 acres of the Mall. I do not know whether sentiment cuts any figure in this House or not, but I think it ought to. This park was dedicated by those having authority to do so—by Washington himself—with the purpose that it should remain such forever, in its integrity, as a whole.

Now, I have failed to hear one single reason or argument, outside of the desire to remove grade crossings, why we should permit this permanent structure to be erected in this park. If there were no other means by which grade crossings could be removed except by erecting a depot of large proportions, covering 14 acres, with car sheds reaching into the very heart of this park, then there might be at least a utilitarian argument made in favor of it. But it is clearly feasible as an engineering proposition to locate the depot just south of the Mall, answering all the purposes of public convenience that it will to place it in the Mall. The people of the District of Columbia are opposed to having it in the Mall. The people of the United States are opposed to having it in the Mall. Who, then, is in favor of any such desecration of this almost sacred property for this utilitarian purpose? Can there be anybody favoring it except the railroad company? And why? Because it it is valuable land and desirable.

I admit that the directors of the railroad corporation are looking out for the interests of the company from a financial standpoint only. I am not asking them to exercise any sentiment or yield to such a feeling as that, and yet I am not ready to make any attacks upon them as a soulless corporation. The only purpose they can have is to put it to their own uses. Regardless of the large appropriations that have been made by this Congress the people of the United States will vote cheerfully and willingly, if necessary to do equity to this company, that we pay them in cold cash every dollar that this part of the Mall is worth. I know they would vote it. Now, then, what excuse is there to desecrate, demolish, and destroy it forever by permitting the railroad to enter into this park if the people are ready to give to this company every dollar in cold cash that it is worth to-day.

This is the only opportunity we will have, and I appeal to you. This park belongs to you, and not locally to the District of Columbia. It belongs to every citizen of the United States, and I presume that every citizen of the United States has sufficient patriotic sentiment to want to preserve it in its integrity. Who would listen, were it in our power, to a scheme to desecrate Mount Vernon by some utilitarian structure? Sentiment does cut a figure. It ought to, and whenever this free people cease to be moved by patriotic sentiment good-by to institutions which such sentiment has built up and maintained to the present hour. I have no personal reason on earth to ask you to reject this conference report, except that we may not now and forever undo what Washington did one hundred and ten years ago, and which all the Congresses since to this day have kept inviolate. I appeal to you to vote down this conference report out of no ill feeling to the railroad company, out of no disrespect to the judgment of those who differ with me, but in order that we may preserve and make more beautiful this magnificent city of Washington.

I will vote for an amendment to pay the railroad company every dollar which this land will be worth to them. Is not that sufficient? I would rather pay a reasonable tax for the balance of my life, if necessary, than to take out of the very heart of this beautiful city, out of this magnificent park, 14 acres and devote it to the most beautiful depot that ever could be built. What makes it beautiful? The object and purpose for which it was dedicated, for which it was created, and no structure, however beautiful architecturally, can ever take the place of the sentiment, the most hallowed patriotic sentiment which hangs around and over it.

You can build a utilitarian structure, if you want to, on the White Lot, in front of the White House, anywhere, upon the sole argument that is presented here, and that is that the corporation would like to have it and can use it in their business. I do not propose to do them any injustice. I would rather give them a bounty, a subsidy, a gratuity, anything that we can pay, to get rid of what has been done in this park. When this park is demolished it is demolished now and forever. I appeal to you to lay your hands on your hearts and think of what you are doing before it is forever too late. Let us reject this report and have the bill reformed, and give them as fine a depot as money will buy, and I am almost willing to vote all the money out of the Treasury to pay for it, although I do not think that is necessary or that there is any good argument for it; but I would do it rather than see this House do what no other Congress has ever done, and may God prevent any other Congress ever entertaining such a purpose.

Life and Character of the Late Hon. Reese C. De Graffenreid.

OF
HON. JOSEPH C. SIBLEY,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, January 25, 1903,

On the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted, that the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of Hon. REESE C. DE GRAFFENREID, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Texas.

"Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a faithful and distinguished public servant, the House at the conclusion of the memorial proceedings of this day shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk be, and is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased."

Mr. SIBLEY said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I esteem it a privilege upon this occasion to join my colleagues in offering some tribute of esteem and affection to our departed friend. It was my pleasure to know him well and better to appreciate with the passing days those manly qualities which endeared him to us.

He was a man of great self-reliance, of rugged and robust character, yet withal tender and affectionate toward his friends. I believe he was always brave and always truthful. Though rarely taking the floor of this body to join in debate upon questions at issue, it always seemed to his friends that this arose through diffidence; certainly not through lack of ability.

Many of us were present upon one occasion when Mr. DE GRAFFENREID was called upon to respond to "The State of Texas." Mr. Speaker, for beauty of diction, for eloquence which arose almost to the heights of sublimity, for a grand tribute to the past, the present, and the future of this imperial Commonwealth, his words of praise for a bold and enlightened people sprang from his heart, leaped into flame upon his tongue, and carried all before him. I have never heard another such tribute paid to a Commonwealth and her people, and doubt if I ever shall.

Mr. Speaker, Texas is a great State. While she is no longer a lone star, she remains and will remain one of the brightest in our national galaxy. She has given and is giving men to this nation whose fame shall endure. She is producing statesmen who are held in honor in all sections of our country, men in whose fame we all have just pride. The career of our departed friend terminated too soon, perhaps, to achieve fame as a statesman, but among those of us who knew him his virtues will ever remain a pleasant memory. He has solved life's riddle and has joined that great majority whose ranks shall be further swelled by us in the future, more or less remote. Doubtless our friend had faults, and when our life's work shall be closed may our faults all be forgotten and the better side of our nature be held in as kindly remembrance by those who shall follow us as we hold to-day the memory and the virtues of Mr. DE GRAFFENREID.

The Trusts.

SPEECH

OF

HON. D. LINN GOOCH,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 7, 1903,

On the bill (H. R. 17) requiring all corporations engaged in interstate commerce to file returns with the Secretary of the Treasury disclosing their true financial condition and of their capital stock, and imposing a tax upon such as have outstanding capital stock unpaid in whole or in part.

Mr. GOOCH said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Some years ago there lived down in the Blue-grass State, from which I come, a well-to-do farmer who was a great lover of dogs. He was likewise a hunter of small game—not such a grizzly-bear and mountain-lion hunter as our strenuous President—but a hunter who took more pride in his dogs than in the objects of their chase. He had all kinds of dogs. His dogs were comparable even to those of the town immortalized by Goldsmith:

> And in that town a dog was found,
> As many dogs there be;
> Both mongrel, puppy, whelp, and hound,
> And curs of low degree.

This great lover of the canine species was sent to the legislature, and immediately he was besieged upon all sides to father a dog law. He had never before fathered any law. He was a Republican in politics, and so he went to a Republican lawyer—one of the few in those parts—and asked the lawyer to draw up a dog law for him. Upon being asked the details of the desired law, he answered:

I want a good, all-around Republican dog law, one that will please my constituents and not interfere with the dogs.

I am fain to believe, Mr. Speaker, that the leaders of the Republican party, in concocting so-called trust legislation, have followed a similar line of policy to that followed by this Republican legislator. Their object has all along been to get up a trust law that would satisfy the tremendous clamor that has been reverberating throughout the land against these dangerous and unlawful combinations and that at the same time would not damage or embarrass them.

It is an old saying, and a true one, that "murder will out." It is fortunate for decent, peaceable citizens that it is so. It is also true, I believe, that political corruption and villainy will "out." At least, one great piece of political corruption and rascality has now been detected and exposed, though long ago suspected and virtually known by all intelligent men. I refer, Mr. Speaker, to the criminal connection of the Republican party leaders with the trusts.

The pitiful record of the present session in the work of "trust busting" might in itself be claimed as proving this point; but that would be only in the nature of "circumstantial evidence." But, fortunately, direct and positive evidence has now been afforded by the trusts themselves.

Mr. Rockefeller, Mr. Morgan, Mr. Cammack, Mr. Frick, Mr. Griscom, and other great moguls of the trusts, have come to Washington within the last week or two, or have sent their personal representatives here, to enforce their mandate that Congress and the Executive must drop this trust agitation at once.

It is too mild a term to say they are "exerting their influence;" they are saying to us and also to the President, not "please do thus and so," but "you must do thus and so."

Mr. Rockefeller telegraphs briefly, "This antitrust legislation must be stopped."

Mr. Morgan goes to the White House with the "big four" of the Senate and "sees" the President about it. And it is noticeable that on the next day the emasculated antitrust bills passes the Senate without a word of debate on the part of the Republicans. Also, that the House rushes through its legislation a day or two later without any suitable opportunity for debate or amendment. Also, that the legislation of the two Houses is different, thus involving a disagreement, a conference, and a compromise, or else a final disagreement and entire failure of legislation. In fact, it makes little difference, for the practical result in either case will be an entire failure of effective legislation; and that is precisely what the trusts want and what they have been after down here.

The whole course of the conspiracy of the trusts and the Republican party leaders has been laid bare, and, as in the case of "murder will out," it is fortunate for all respectable citizens that it has been. It was a secret, but is a secret no longer; it is now a cold fact.

If it had not been for Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. Speaker, there would have been no antitrust legislation this session. The other party leaders—the ones who run the Republican campaign committees, who select the candidates, collect funds, and dictate party policies—are opposed to any and all antitrust legislation.

The party leaders perceive that there is a popular unrest about the trusts, and of course they would "go through the motion" of hearkening to the people by putting a trust plank in the platforms and introducing and debating antitrust bills and afterwards pigeonholing them. But this is all they will do of their own accord, and they never would have passed any bills on the subject this session if the appeals of the Democratic party to the people and the demands of the people had not driven them to it.

In order to carry the last election they were forced to make glowing promises of what they were going to do in favor of the people and in opposition to the trusts. They are now endeavoring to fulfill these promises in the same way that the Kentucky farmer legislator endeavored to prepare his antidog law.

The programme for the session, as arranged by the party leaders and trust magnates in joint conclave, was very simple. Something had to appear to be done to appease the people. That "something," as finally arranged, was to introduce a few harmless little bills in both Houses, have them debated, have one or more of them, perhaps, passed by one House and debated in the other, and then finally have them fail in the other on account of "lack of time" and the "shortness of the session." The result of the President's interference where he was not wanted has been that both Houses have actually passed antitrust bills, although, as I have already said, they are not bills that will hurt the trusts.

The trusts and the Republican party leaders care nothing about the country at large. They care nothing for the common people. All they are after is the money, power to control legislation, and, if need be, to enslave the masses. They care not by what means they may secure this power.

The late Mr. Jay Gould once testified before an investigating committee that in a Republican district he was a Republican; in a Democratic district he was a Democrat; in a doubtful district he was doubtful; but in all districts he was an Erie man all the time.

That, Mr. Speaker, is substantially the position of the trust magnates and the Republican party leaders.

In the midst of all this political plotting, this mighty clash of wealthy and powerful influence, what hope is there for relief and help for the plain people of this country? Is there any chance for saving the old independence of the individual citizen from ruin and extinction? Must Lincoln's passionate prayer for the preservation of a Government of the people, for the people, by the people, be denied, after all? Has the nation been saved from the consequences of foreign attack and intestine strife only to perish by the cancer of political corruption and plutocratic domination?

The only hope of the people is in the restoration of the Democratic party to power. The Republican party leaders are copartners of the trusts. But with the Democrats in power there would be a different story to tell. First of all, the Democrats should nominate for President some tried and true Democrat—not some Republican masquerading as a Democrat; not some friend of the trusts, but some genuine, trustworthy, popular Democrat who would command the public's entire confidence and draw out the full party vote. Such a nominee, I believe, would sweep the country in 1904; he would carry with him an overwhelming Democratic majority in this House. Then, and not until then, will the country be enabled to secure the enactment of measures which will reach the evils now playing havoc with the body politic.

Meanwhile the trusts reign supreme. Their managers and the Republican leaders meet in their luxurious mansions, form plans for continuing their power, and over their champagne laugh gleefully at the way they have hoodwinked the people with their cunning "antitrust" schemes. They put 95 per cent of the proceeds of the industries of the country into their own pockets and give the working men and women the other 5 per cent, and then say to them, "What are you grumbling about? Do you not see how 'prosperous' you are?"

Mr. Rockefeller gives a million dollars to his pet college, recoups himself by making twenty millions or so by putting up the price of oil when the people are perishing with cold, and then says to himself, "What do they mean at Washington? That I have to send a man down there to tell them that I say they must stop this antitrust tomfoolery."

Farmers and laboring people, do as you please; you have the power to do so; you have the ballot and are still a majority in the land. If you prefer to keep the Republican party in power you can do so, but never hereafter can you plead the excuse that you were ignorant of the consequences. The Republican leaders have exposed themselves this winter. Their identity with the trusts is now a proven fact. It rests with you to say, and with you only, whether you will voluntarily, with your eyes wide open, sign with your own hands the sentence dooming you to permanent industrial serfdom and slavery.

Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this "milk and water" antitrust bill, not because it is in reality an effective measure, but because it is at least better than no antitrust legislation, and because this is the only opportunity that I will have under the present régime to cast a vote which has even the appearance of curbing the dangerous power of these gigantic corporations. I shall cast my vote for this bill, with the cherished hope that before long I shall have the pleasure, under a Democratic régime, of voting for a genuine, effective antitrust measure, which I know will curb the illicit power of these great combinations and bring much-needed relief to the farmers and the laborers and the great masses of the American people.

The Trusts and National Aid to Road Improvement.

SPEECH
OF
HON. WALTER P. BROWNLOW,
OF TENNESSEE,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 7, 1903,

On the bill (H. R. 17) requiring all corporations engaged in interstate commerce to file returns with the Secretary of the Treasury, disclosing their true financial condition, and of their capital stock, and imposing a tax upon such as have outstanding capital stock unpaid in whole or in part.

Mr. BROWNLOW said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Much has been said during the last few years in reference to the formation of trusts and the evil effects that spring from these great aggregations of capital. It is claimed that the tendency of all this is to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. No doubt there is an increasing difference from year to year in the positions of different individuals and classes in the social fabric. But it occurs to me that this results partly from an unintentional discrimination in the distribution of the great revenues of the Government of the United States, so that those living in great cities and having command of the great trusts and consolidated wealth of the nation receive substantially 90 per cent of the great appropriations made from year to year by Congress, while only 10 per cent is appropriated for the direct benefit of those living in the agricultural States and rural districts, notwithstanding the fact that at least one-half of the great revenues of the Government, aggregating about $700,000,000 a year, is contributed by these very people who live in the country districts. Most of the Representatives in this body are either from the rural districts or express a solicitude for the welfare of the rural population, but the variation between their expressions of friendship and favor for these rural communities and the practice in appropriating money by acts of Congress suggests that the "voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau."

There is a serious question whether this body, with its all but omnipotent power, can successfully interfere with the consolidated interests and vested rights of the great trusts and corporations; but there can be no doubt that they can correct many inequalities that have crept into our practice in making appropriations of the public money for public purposes.

This I am endeavoring to do by House bill No. 15369, introduced by me on the first day of the present session of Congress, which seeks to establish a policy to be pursued by the United States Government in reference to the permanent improvement of the public highways of the country. Some will say that such improvement is outside the jurisdiction of the General Government; but the Constitution was ordained and established (among other things) to "promote the general welfare," and Congress is especially authorized to "establish post-offices and post-roads."

Few things will contribute more in a time of peace and industrial prosperity to the general welfare than the permanent improvement of the public roads; and there never was a time when Congress could so appropriately exercise its power to establish post roads as at present, when, to use the language of the President's message, "rural free-delivery service is no longer in the experimental stage; it has become a fixed policy. The results following its introduction have fully justified the Congress in the large appropriations made for its establishment and extension." Every such rural free-delivery route is a post-road.

A CHAPTER OF EARLY HISTORY.

It is well known that the Congress of the United States during the early history of the Republic appropriated large sums of money to build and maintain a system of national roads, the most famous one of which is known as the "Old Cumberland road," and, by reason of its preeminence, the "Old National road." This road was started in the year 1811 at Cumberland, Md., and continued almost due west in practically a straight line through Maryland, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois to St. Louis, and is said to be the longest straight road ever built by any government in the world. Though never fully completed on the western extremity, it was substantially 700 miles long, and it cost about $7,000,000, or practically $10,000 a mile.

The subsequent abandonment of the policy of the United States Government, as expressed and carried out in this great road, has led many persons to suppose that the entire question of road building, or substantial aid thereto, so far as the United States Government is concerned, had been settled and disposed of for all time; but a careful examination of the controversy, which ended in the abandonment of the former policy of the United States, will show that it turned more upon the question of jurisdiction pertaining to the control of the road by the United States Government, or by the various State governments through whose territory the road passed, than upon the right of Congress to make appropriations to build such roads. Most of the trouble resulted from the attempt to collect toll for the use of the road, and not on account of appropriations of money from the United States Government to build it. The objection was not made to a free road, but to a toll road. The infringement of the rules for collecting toll subjected the citizens of the various States to the pains and penalties of violating a United States law and of being arrested by United States officials.

The following paragraph bearing upon this question is quoted from The Old National Road—A Chapter of American Expansion, by Archer Butler Hulbert:

> But the road was hardly completed when a specter of constitutional cavil arose, threatening its existence. In 1822, a bill was passed by Congress looking toward the preservation and repair of the newly built road. It should be stated that the roadbed, though completed in one sense, was not in a condition to be used extensively unless continually repaired. In many places only a single layer of broken stone had been laid, and, with the volume of traffic which was daily passing over it, the road did not promise to remain in good condition. In order to secure funds for the constant repairs necessary, this bill ordered the establishment of turnpikes with gates and tolls. The bill was immediately vetoed by President Monroe on the ground that Congress, according to his interpretation of the Constitution, did not have the power to pass such a sweeping measure of internal improvement.
> The President based his conclusions upon the following grounds, stated in a special message to Congress dated May 4, 1822:
> "A power to establish turnpikes with gates and tolls and to enforce the collection of the tolls by penalty implies a power to adopt and execute a complete system of internal improvements. A right to impose duties, to be paid by all persons passing a certain road and on horses and carriages, as is done by this bill, involves the right to take the land from the proprietor on a valuation and to pass laws for the protection of the road from injuries, and if it exists as to one road it exists as to any other and to as many roads as Congress may think proper to establish—a right to legislate for others. It is a complete right of jurisdiction and sovereignty for all the purposes of internal improvement, and not merely the right of applying money under the power vested in Congress to make appropriations (under which power, with the consent of the States through which the road passes, the work was originally commenced and has been so far executed)."

The original policy of the United States Government, by which it appropriated all the money required to build a great road, was followed by the other extreme of appropriating nothing either to build or maintain or to contribute in any way to the betterment of the common highways of the country. This latter policy has continued for practically two generations, and the result is that there has been very little improvement in our public roads. While the nation has made more progress than any other nation in the world during that time, it is a remarkable fact that it is behind all other civilized nations in reference to the improvement of its highways. It seems that by the former policy the Government did too much, and by the latter policy it does too little. There should be a middle ground between these two extremes, which would conform to the composite nature of our Government and have a tendency to distribute more equitably its burdens and benefits.

MAIN FEATURES OF THE PROPOSED BILL.

A reference to the present bill will show that it does not seek to reestablish the original policy requiring the United States Government to appropriate the total amount of money necessary to improve any given highway, but that it only provides that the Government shall contribute one-half of its cost, when the road is built, in cooperation with "any State or civil subdivision thereof." The following sections are quoted from the bill:

SEC. 5. That any State, or political subdivision thereof, through its proper officers having jurisdiction of the public roads, may apply to the director of the bureau of public roads for cooperation in the actual construction of a permanent improvement of any public highway within the said State in the following manner: Every application for the cooperation herein provided for shall be accompanied by a properly certified resolution stating that the public interest demands the improvement of the highway described therein, but such description shall not include any portion of a highway within the boundaries of any city or incorporated village.

SEC. 6. That the director of said bureau, upon receipt of any such application, shall investigate and determine whether the highway or section thereof sought to be improved is of sufficient public importance to come within the purposes of this act, taking into account the use, location, and value of such highway or section thereof for the purposes of common traffic and travel, and for the rural free delivery of mail by the United States Government, and after such investigation shall certify his approval of such application. If he shall disapprove such application, he shall certify his reasons therefor to the public officer or officers making the application.

SEC. 7. That if the director of said bureau shall approve such application, he shall cause the highway or section thereof therein described to be mapped, both in outline and profile. He shall indicate how much of such highway or section thereof may be improved by deviation from the existing lines whenever it shall be deemed of advantage to obtain a shorter or more direct road without lessening its usefulness, or wherever such deviation is of advantage by reason of lessened gradients. He shall also cause plans and specifications of such highway or section thereof to be made of telford, macadam, or gravel roadway, or other suitable construction, taking into consideration climate, soil, and material to be had in the vicinity thereof, and the extent and nature of the traffic likely to be upon the highway, specifying in his judgment the kind of road a wise economy demands.

It is important to notice that in case any State should fail to avail itself of the privileges granted in this bill any civil subdivision of the State could take advantage of it. Some of the States have provided political machinery whereby they can take charge of and direct the work of road making; others have not, but there is no State that has not some civil subdivisions in it that are provided with the proper political machinery for putting this work into operation, and they may thereby avail themselves of all the benefits provided for in the bill. In order that no State may receive an undue advantage in the distribution of this fund by reason of priority of application or greater ability to furnish its portion of the cost, it is provided in section 13:

That no State shall receive in aid of road construction, out of any money appropriated for that purpose, according to the provisions of this act, a greater proportion of the total amount appropriated than its population bears to the total population of the United States.

The change in the policy of the United States Government, as indicated above, has been adopted by all of the States in the Union that originally built State roads or gave substantial aid in maintaining them. Many of the older States followed concurrently the original policy of the United States in building and maintaining State roads within their limits, as the United States Government built and maintained the national-road system connecting State with State. But all these various States abandoned that policy and followed the example set by the General Government of withdrawing their support from the movement, and the result has been that the entire cost of building good roads in the United States during the last two generations has fallen upon the counties or the townships or the districts in the immediate locality of the road improved. The entire burden of road construction has therefore been thrown upon the people and property of the rural districts, which has proven to be too heavy a burden for most of them to bear. The consequence is that it has been dropped to a great extent, and the roads remain unimproved.

It was perhaps not unnatural, when the great mass of all the people in the United States lived in the rural districts, to require each community to make such improvement as it chose of its own public roads; but at the present time a very large proportion of the population and a much larger proportion of the wealth is concentrated in large cities, and, according to the generally prevailing method, they do not contribute anything to the improvement of the highways. It is therefore desirable that some new method should be introduced whereby all the people shall contribute to the improvement of all the roads. This is not only desirable but it is just and equitable, because the public highways belong to all the people, and their improvement is beneficial to those living in the great cities as well as to those living in rural districts. This is especially true when we consider the newly invented vehicles that are now in common use upon the highways—that is to say, the bicycle, the automobile, and the suburban street car.

THE STATE-AID PLAN.

Within the past few years several progressive States have inaugurated a new method of cooperation different from that prevailing at any time before in this country, either according to the policy of the General Government or the government of any of the States. The beneficial results that spring from such a cooperative method of building permanent highways have been well illustrated by the States of New Jersey, Massachusetts, and New York. In each of these States a general road fund is provided by taxing all the property in the entire State, both city and country.

The fund so raised is contributed to very largely by those who, under the heretofore prevailing plan, would not pay anything for such purposes. In the State of New York nearly 90 per cent of the State tax, and consequently of the road fund, is paid by people living in great cities and by the corporations of the State, so that only about 10 per cent of the State road fund is paid by the owners of property in the rural districts, although by a provision of the law one-half of the cost of each and every improved highway is paid for out of this general fund, the remaining half being paid by the counties, 15 per cent of which may be taxed against the property abutting upon the improved road. In the twelfth section of the bill is a proviso that—

Nothing herein shall be construed to prevent any State or political subdivision thereof from distributing the said one-half so that the State may bear a portion, the county a portion, and the owners abutting on the said road another portion.

NATIONAL AID PROPOSED.

The bill under consideration seeks to extend the principles of cooperation to a still greater extent, and to bring in the United States Government as a cooperative factor to contribute its quota out of a fund that is still more general than any State fund could be, and to which all the people contribute more or less. If it is wise and equitable and beneficial for the State of New York to raise a general fund, out of which a portion of the cost of constructing the highways is to be paid, it would seem to be just as equitable and beneficial for the United States Government, having already raised the general fund, to contribute a portion toward the cost of constructing permanent highways in each and every State. Appropriations made by Congress for the river and harbor bills aggregate in the whole something over $440,000,000, and the last annual river and harbor bill appropriated an amount nearly equal to $1 per capita for all the people of the United States for the single purpose of cheapening transportation over water by deepening the water in the rivers and harbors, whereas the entire appropriation annually by any State for all State purposes seldom exceeds $1 per capita, and is generally less. If it is good policy to appropriate so liberally in the river and harbor bill, which no one seems to doubt, it may be just as good policy to contribute with equal liberality to cheapening transportation over land, and especially when it is considered that for every dollar contributed by the United States at least an equal amount must be contributed by the various States and subdivisions to supplement that fund, which is not the case in the river and harbor bill.

Another reason for this course will be found in the fact that nearly all great appropriations made by the United States Government are expended in or near great cities, while but little, and generally nothing, is expended in the rural districts to directly benefit the inhabitants thereof. The great river and harbor improvements and the great public buildings are found mostly in the great cities, and illustrate the general rule.

NECESSITY FOR COOPERATION.

It seems more apparent, as time goes by, that a general plan of cooperation will have to be resorted to in order to distribute the burden of taxation necessary to improve the public highways as they should be improved. So long as we pursue the original method of taxation the entire burden of cost for highway improvement falls upon the owners of agricultural lands and the persons living in the rural districts. When the great mass of people lived in the rural districts this was a just and equitable distribution of taxes for such purposes, but with the changed conditions of the present day, when one-half of the people live in cities, and much more than one-half of the wealth is concentrated in these cities and in the corporations that are so powerful at the present time, it is absolutely necessary that some means should be devised whereby the great revenues requisite for the great improvement that is called for should be derived from all of the people and resources of the country as nearly as possible, and not rest, as heretofore, upon the meager few that are comparatively impoverished by the decline in prices of agricultural lands and products that has been manifested during the last twenty years.

The impossibility of proceeding extensively without some such readjustment of the burden of cost is demonstrated by every observation, whereas the possibility of proceeding where they have heretofore failed is shown by the recent course of events in the State of New York. For a period of practically two hundred years they had never built any permanent roads in the entire State, and when I was in Buffalo last year I learned that in Erie County, of which Buffalo is the county seat, they had never had a good road outside of the corporate limits of the city of Buffalo until within the last six years. I was told also by Mr. Samuel Spencer, the president of the Southern Railway Company, who has lived for many years past in New York City, that no longer than six or eight years ago as soon as you had passed the city limits in the northern portion of New York City you would come to impassable roads. I am calling attention to these facts to show that in the Empire State, and near such great and growing cities as New York and Buffalo, they were not able to carry on any substantial improvement of the roads, because of the difficulty of raising the revenue so long as it rested entirely upon the adjacent property or the persons living in the rural districts; but under the new law we find that the great corporations and the great concentrated wealth of the cities are pouring a fund into the State treasury, out of which they draw one-half of the cost of building the country road, and that with this fund they are making more progress in the last two years than they had made before in two hundred years.

I feel certain that my bill will be passed at some future time, possibly not at this short session of Congress, and perhaps not in its present form, but in some amended form that will provide for a more extensive plan of cooperation between the United States and the various States and subdivisions thereof than has ever been undertaken before.

It is well to encourage the supporters of road improvement in the reasonable expectation that if they take a forward step they will be aided and assisted by the general plan that is outlined in this bill. I remember that one gentleman in making a speech, I believe at Fargo, N. Dak., said that if you would give the ordinary individual 50 cents, he would do $5 worth of work to get it. This proposition is well illustrated in the object-lesson work conducted by the office of public road inquiries, for it is literally true that every dollar expended by that office in such work has been supplemented by $10 contributed by those getting the benefit of the small expenditure made by the United States Government. My bill does better than that; it gives a dollar if you do a dollar's worth of work to get it.

NOTHING NEW IN PRINCIPLE.

The idea of the National Government taking an active part in the construction of the highways, so popular three-quarters of a century ago, has for several decades been considered obsolete. But the interest manifested in my bill, which provides for national aid to road building, shows that this idea is very much alive. Indeed, the popular interest in the subject is a source of surprise to those who have not been giving the matter attention. And this interest is by no means a sudden development; it has been growing steadily for a number of years.

It is now ten years since the popular demand that the Government do something led to the establishment of an Office of Public Road Inquiries in the United States Department of Agriculture. The work of this Office was intended to be purely educational in character. It was to collect and disseminate practical information concerning the roads of the country and means and methods for their improvement. The first work of this Office was to prepare and publish a large number of bulletins and circulars treating on the various phases of road building and improvement. This work occupied several years, and it was well done. If the roads in most parts of the country remain bad, it is not for the want of information as to how they may be improved in the best and most economical manner, for Uncle Sam's good roads' Office is a veritable "information bureau" on the subject.

But the work of this Office did not stop here. The educational idea was carried further, and during the past three years the object-lesson feature has assumed greater importance. The idea as carried out is very simple. When the people of some progressive community or the authorities of some educational institution want a piece of road built to illustrate the benefits of good roads and the methods of building them, application is made to the Department of Agriculture, and, whenever possible, a Government expert is sent to supervise the work. Recently a number of prominent and progressive railroad men have been giving the road question some study, and have come to the conclusion that the improvement of the roads in the territory tributary to their lines would materially increase their business. So popular has this idea become that the officials of some of the leading railways have come forward with offers to cooperate with the Government in the object-lesson work. Another voluntary factor in this cooperative work is the manufacturers of road-building devices who desire to bring their machinery to the attention of the public. In this cooperative work the Government furnished the experts, the manufacturers the machinery, and the railroads the transportation.

This idea has proven extremely popular. Object-lesson roads have been built under Government supervision in 22 States, and so great has been the demand for national aid of this kind that a large number of applications have to be refused every year because the funds appropriated by Congress are insufficient to employ and pay the expenses of enough experts to do the work. Already Congress has three times increased the appropriations for this work, but the $30,000 now appropriated annually proves wholly inadequate to meet the demands for this educational work.

It should be borne in mind that all work of this kind done by the Government is in the nature of national aid. There is therefore nothing new in principle in my bill providing for national aid of a more extensive and substantial character. It is proposed that the Government shall no longer confine its assistance to educational work; that it shall furnish not only information and supervision, but financial assistance. Under certain limitations the National Government will cooperate with States and counties in the improvement of the common roads, each assuming a certain proportion of the expense.

If this educational work done by the Government in recent years has done so much to encourage and stimulate road improvement, what may we not expect from this great extension of the principle of national aid? It is sometimes urged as an objection to national aid that it will cause the people to relax their efforts at road improvement, and to depend on the General Government to do the work for them. Is it not likely to produce exactly the opposite result? The large fund which Congress will appropriate for this work will be divided among the States in proportion to population. But no State can secure its share except by complying with the conditions prescribed, the chief of which is that it shall raise a like sum for the same purpose. Instead of discouraging State effort this should greatly stimulate it. Again, if a State takes no action looking to the acceptance of the Government's proffered help the individual counties may do so, and this again will create a rivalry among the counties in their efforts to secure a part of the national fund due the State.

The scheme is far-reaching in its possibilities for economic development. Time and intelligence will be required to work out the details of its application, but there appears to be no serious obstacle, either practical or constitutional, in the way of its realization.

THE DUTY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

The fact that the United States Government has taken no substantial part in building or maintaining public highways in this country for the last two generations is accepted by many people as final proof that the General Government is forbidden, either by constitutional limitations or by sound public policy, from engaging in any such internal improvement. On the other hand, it should be noted that no system of public highways was ever built up or maintained in any country without the substantial aid of the general government of that country. The almost universal lack of improvement in regard to our public-road system is directly referable to the fact that there has been no well-established system or policy pertaining to the question. Those who have done most to agitate for permanent improvements have found that the farmers of the country have almost invariably been opposed to any general plan heretofore suggested for the building up of permanent and durable roads, although it is generally conceded that the farmers would be benefited as much, if not more, than any other class of people by such roads.

The real reason for the farmer's objection is found in the fact that, according to the ordinary scheme of improvement, he would be called upon to pay the entire burden of cost, which he intuitively feels to be greater than he ought to bear, if not greater than he is able to bear. Considering this long-continued opposition by the people in the rural districts, and the lack of policy on the part of the General Government, and especially considering that road building is undoubtedly a public duty which rests upon the Government in some form, it seems that the farmers are entitled to some assistance in bearing the necessary burden of cost to improve the public highways, and that the United States Government should step forward with some definite policy and assume some share of the burden and responsibility which is necessary to produce a creditable system of public highways, and which has, as already stated, never been effected in any country at any time without the substantial aid and encouragement of the general government of the country. In this connection I quote Mr. Henry I. Budd, State road commissioner of New Jersey, who says:

In no way can our Government add so rapidly to the prosperity of the nation as by contributing of its surplus to the macadamizing of the highways of the settled portions of the country, and thus enable the present generation to save millions in transportation and also make the sections already partly settled so desirable that the inhabitants will not wish to leave them. There is not much hope of general road improvement in the country until the National Government, as in ancient Rome and modern France, becomes their foster father.

My bill seeks to establish such a policy to be followed by the United States. It is a policy of cooperation, and seeks to bring in the General Government as a cooperating factor to work in connection with any State or civil subdivision thereof, so that the United States should furnish one-half the cost of improvement and the State or civil subdivision thereof, cooperating, should furnish the other half.

FREE RURAL DELIVERY.

The Constitution of the United States puts no such limitation upon the Government as to prevent the cooperation provided for in this bill, and, so far as public policy is concerned, that remains to be settled by the consensus of opinion of the people of the United States. It was not considered good public policy until very recently to undertake to deliver the United States mail to the people living in the rural districts, but it has been found upon trial to be very useful, very economical, and very beneficial to those living in the rural districts; and yet for forty or fifty years the people in cities have been favored by having their mail delivered at their doors, while people living in the rural districts have been discriminated against because we had not discovered until lately that it is good public policy to deliver mail alike to people in the country and in the city. One is almost as easily obtainable as the other. There is no reason why the mail could not have been delivered to the people living in the rural districts forty years ago as well as at the present time. As a matter of fact, the roads were as good then, for the most part, as they are now, and the population in very many of the older States was less sparse in the rural districts at that time than at the present time. Now that the people are manifesting their desires to have the mail delivered in the country, and have demonstrated that it is possible, their Representatives in Congress are eager to appropriate almost any sum of money to bring about this result, the appropriations having been increased by the present Congress from $7,500,000 to $12,600,000.

What we have seen and are seeing in the development of rural free-mail delivery is likely to be repeated in the matter of making permanent improvements to the highways. Once let it be understood that the desired result can be accomplished through a system of cooperation, aided, fostered, and encouraged by the General Government, and then let the people of the country express themselves in favor of the plan and you will find that Congress and the Constitution will not be against but for it. What members of Congress want is an expression from their constituency, showing what is desired in the several districts. There are many rural districts that have no great rivers or great harbors or great cities which entitle them to public buildings, but there is no district without many miles of public roads that need to be permanently improved. Let the people ask for it and they will receive the assistance which they desire and deserve.

It is a remarkable fact that the United States Government has already appropriated a million dollars to Porto Rico for road building and another million to the Philippine Islands; and the Secretary of War has just made an appeal to Congress through the President of the United States, who strongly indorses that appeal, to have $3,000,000 appropriated for the use of the Philippine government. I submit the following quotation from Secretary Root's letter:

Previous experiences indicate that such an appropriation could be made the most useful by giving the Philippine government discretion to apply it in such proportions as they deem wise in the direct purchase and distribution or sale of supplies, or through the employment of labor in the construction of Government wagon roads.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF NATIONAL AID.

So far as the constitutional phase of the question is concerned, I have been surprised and pleased to find the highest Democratic authority supporting the constitutionality of the bill. The Washington Post in an editorial says:

The Brownlow road-building scheme is dangerous in that it would probably be declared constitutional. As all roads are or could be made post-roads, it is presumable that the National Government could, if so inclined, expend millions or billions on them.

But the best and most complete argument upon this question, also from the Democratic side, was made by Hon. THEODORE F. KLUTTZ, a distinguished member of Congress from North Carolina, who said, touching the question of appropriating money for the Office of Public Road Inquiries, when that bill was under consideration last year:

The General Government, under the direction of our present admirable and progressive Secretary of Agriculture, has done and is doing much, through the Bureau of Public Road Inquiries, to intelligently arouse and direct public attention upon this great question. I believe, however, that the time is ripe for greater things. I believe that the General Government should go farther, and, either by direct appropriation to or cooperation with the States of the Union, inaugurate and push forward a great system of road building throughout the country.

The constitutional argument troubles me little. The Constitution is all right for rivers, creeks, harbors, canals, and public buildings, but all wrong, say gentlemen, for public roads.

In round numbers, as I am informed, about $500,000,000 have been expended by this country for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and at this session the Congress will in all probability appropriate something like seventy millions more for the same purpose. That much of this good money has been and will be wasted, so far as permanent improvement is concerned, goes without saying.

Insignificant creeks and rivers in unknown and uncommercial localities share, perhaps more than equally, with great and meritorious rivers and harbors. Under the present system it perhaps must needs be so, for the "pork" must be so distributed as to secure the passage of the bill, and States which are not represented on the great Committee on Rivers and Harbors, or which by failure of reciprocal representation on other great committees of the House have nothing to trade, fare but poorly in the distribution. My own good State of North Carolina is thus a sufferer.

My purpose now, however, is not to complain of the amounts appropriated for rivers and harbors. An enlightened public policy demands and sanctions such appropriations, and the abuses are the fault of our legislative system.

Time was when such appropriations were denounced, fulminated against, and vetoed. The strict letter of the Constitution was invoked by Madison, Monroe, Jackson, Polk, and Pierce in sounding rhetoric against such a supposedly unwarranted use of the Federal funds.

The question of the express, implied, and incidental powers of the General Government and of the reserved rights of the States will be found learnedly discussed in the veto messages of all these venerated Presidents, and always resolved against the rightfulness of appropriations for internal improvements, rivers, harbors, canals, and public highways being always joined in the same condemnation. The very first of these, the veto message of President Monroe, dated March 3, 1817, says:

Having considered the bill this day presented to me, entitled "An act to set apart and pledge certain funds for internal improvements," and which sets apart and pledges certain funds for "constructing roads and canals, and improving the navigation of water courses, in order to facilitate, promote, and give security to internal commerce, and to render more easy and less expensive the means and provisions for the common defense, I am constrained by the insuperable difficulty I feel reconciling the bill with the Constitution of the United States to return it with that objection to the House in which it originated."

No distinction appears here, and the veto applies equally to rivers and harbors, to roads and canals. It is worthy of note, too, that this veto message was sustained only by a vote of 56 against 60 in this early Congress of the fathers of the Republic.

Next comes the message of President Monroe vetoing the act for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road, dated May 4, 1822, accompanied by a lengthy and learned paper of many pages, the conclusion of the whole being that Congress has no constitutional power to make appropriations for any internal improvements.

Here, again, it is noticeable that this veto was also sustained only by a vote of 72 against 68. Following, next comes the message of President Jackson, dated May 27, 1830, vetoing the Maysville turnpike bill, which equally reprobates appropriations for roads and canals and which was sustained by the narrow margin of 96 to 92. Again, on December 6, 1832, President Jackson gives at length his reasons for withholding his signature from "An act for the improvement of certain harbors and the navigation of certain rivers," affirming his veto message of the Maysville road bill.

President Tyler, on June 11, 1844, vetoed an act making appropriations for the improvement of certain rivers and harbors, giving substantially the same constitutional objections to such legislation, and his veto was only sustained by a minority vote of 91 against 97.

Again, on December 15, 1847, Mr. Polk, in an elaborate message, vetoed a bill for certain internal improvements in Wisconsin, which was presented to Congress too late for reversal.

President Pierce, on August 4, 1854, vetoed a bill for the repair, preservation, etc., of certain public parks, and was only sustained by a minority vote—80 against 95.

Then followed thick and fast similar veto messages from Mr. Pierce. May 19, 1856, he vetoed a bill to remove obstructions to navigation in the mouth of the Mississippi; May 19, 1856, he vetoed the bill for deepening the channel over the St. Clair flats, in the State of Michigan; May 22, 1856, he vetoed a bill for deepening the channel over the St. Marys flats, in the same State; on August 11, 1856, one for the improvement of the Des Moines Rapids, and on August 14, 1856, one for improving the Patapsco River at Baltimore, all of which bills were passed over his veto.

President Buchanan, on February 1, 1860, gave his reasons for withholding his signature from the St. Clair flats bill, and on February 6, 1860, for refusing to sign the bill for removing obstructions from the mouth of the Mississippi. Both these bills had passed the preceding session of Congress, so his veto messages were too late for action and were simply ordered printed and laid on the table.

President Arthur vetoed a river and harbor bill August 1, 1882, and it was promptly passed over his veto. Since that time the constitutional argument seems to have settled in favor of rivers and harbors, but, by a sort of acquiescence, against public roads and highways, though the argument and condemnation of all the veto messages was equally against both.

A study of these veto messages and the legislation which evoked them shows conclusively that, while the Presidential conscience has been opposed to appropriations for internal improvements, the legislative conscience has always been in favor of them. This policy, then, being settled by executive, legislative, and judicial authority in favor of river and harbor improvement, what reason remains for objection to Federal appropriations for highways and post-roads? What constitutional objection can be urged against them which does not lie equally against the other? The need is certainly at least as great, and the time for action, it seems to me, has come.

If it is constitutional to make appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, it is equally constitutional to do so for post-roads and public highways, for these are equally highways of commerce. Public roads are the great arteries of commerce which reach out into the country, gathering up and bringing to the rivers, the canals, the harbors of the cities, as well as to the railroads, the very primary elements and constituents of commerce.

I said, Mr. Chairman, that the constitutional argument does not trouble me. Surely the Constitution is a wonderful instrument. I have the very profoundest respect for it as the most masterly production to be found in political history. It is somewhat remarkable, however, sir, that its provisions can be, and are, invoked for or against any particular legislation as interest or prejudice may dictate.

However, sir, if gentlemen consider the constitutional objection to appropriations for public highways insuperable, what can be their objection to a division of the groaning surplus to the States for this purpose? Surely this is constitutional and democratic. The surplus was distributed among the States under Jackson, and all that would need to be added to this precedent would be the limitation that each State's dividend should be expended solely for public roads.

I am wedded to no particular plan. I do not want the General Government itself to go into the business of road building except for educational and object-lesson purposes. I want none of the rights or duties of the several States invaded. I believe, however, that the General Government constitutionally can, and that it ought to, aid and supplement the work of the people of all the States in this important matter.

I believe that every dollar so expended would be returned tenfold in the enhancement of farm values, in the better and more economical distribution of the mails, in preventing the hegira of our rural population to the already congested cities and towns, in encouraging a reverse flow from city and town to the pure air, fertile fields, and moral surroundings of the farm, and in the increased happiness, loyalty, and gratitude of all the people.

I note also that Gen. M. C. Butler, for eighteen years a Senator of the United States from South Carolina, has lately made a speech at a good-roads convention held at Raleigh, N. C., in which he advocates Federal aid, not according to the original principle by which the United States paid all the cost, but according to the provisions of this bill by which it only pays a contributory share, when requested so to do by any State or civil division thereof.

He says:

The people in the rural districts in the South—and I believe it is so in the North, both East and West—are not able to raise the amount of money necessary to improve the highways. During a long career in public life I have always found that the people do not object to liberal appropriations of the public funds, but they do object to having those public funds misspent or squandered or stolen. Now, gentlemen, the people in the rural districts can not stand the taxation, and they are the people who are directly interested. The people in the cities and the towns have facilities for raising money, issuing bonds, etc., that we people in the country have not; they can stand taxation better than we can. While, as I stated, we could have done very much more than we have done, it is a fact that the country people are not able to carry the whole burden of taxation. I submit that a reasonable sum should be appropriated out of the State treasuries annually. As the public roads are the property of all, and for the use of all, so should the costs be shared by all. Each State should make an appropriation and—as they do in the States of New Jersey and New York—say to any county in the State: "Here is $100,000 in the State treasury. Now, you raise $5,000 or $3,000 or $1,000 in any method you choose and we will duplicate that money from the State treasury." Or you might carry out the same idea in connection with the townships. That would be a beginning.

The next step I would take—and I state this on my own individual responsibility and as my own individual thought and nobody else's—I would go to the Federal Government, which has appropriated $439,000,000 for the improvement of rivers and harbors, although the people do not all get uniform benefit from those appropriations. It is a remarkable fact that, of the $439,000,000 appropriated in three-quarters of a century, there are only two instances where the money has been misapplied by the United States engineers—one of recent date in Savannah, for which the poor creature is now suffering the penalty of his crime, and the other out on the Pacific coast some years ago. Possibly some of the appropriations may have been unwise. I do not suppose any enlightened man in this country will object to the appropriation for the improvement of rivers and harbors. Another appropriation is for this very school of young boys that you are educating. The Government has appropriated $20,000,000 for experiment stations and agricultural colleges, and when the discussion was on they wanted to know under what provision of the United States Constitution it was made. That question was asked in the olden days, and I had an ancestor in the United States Senate who refused to vote a dollar for the improvement of Charleston harbor; but almost the first act of my official life was to get an appropriation of $250,000 for that purpose. There is as ample constitutional warrant for the improvement of the public roads out of the United States Treasury as large as there is for the improvement of rivers and harbors or for the support of the agricultural colleges. It is an appropriation from which we would all get benefit and to which we would all contribute a share. The Constitution of the United States confers upon Congress the right to establish post-offices and post-roads.

Every highway is a post route if the Government chooses to use it. Even in the days of John C. Calhoun he recommended the distribution of the surplus among the several States, and it was done. I think, gentlemen, the best thing for us to do is to go to our Representatives and Senators in Congress and say to them "The great demand of modern times is the improvement of public highways, and the Federal Government should contribute." When that proposition is made, the reply will be that when the Federal Government comes to the aid of the counties and States the people will fold their arms and do nothing. But that can be obviated just as this appropriation for the agricultural colleges is. That appropriation is made with a condition that the States must help before they get the benefit. Why could not this be done in an appropriation for public highways? I know it will be said that the moment the Government interferes the States will cease to make any effort. Now, I am an advocate of self-help; I believe that self-help is the best kind of help; yet I have seen in my experience hundreds of men and boys and enterprises stagnated and defeated because of the want of a little help from the outside. We are in that condition in regard to roads in the South to-day; and it is not confined to the South.

The road system of no civilized country has ever been made perfect without government aid. This country did once spend many millions of dollars on the road from Cumberland, Md., to Wheeling, W. Va. I do not say the United States Government shall come and build the roads, but that they shall appropriate from the public Treasury, to which we all contribute, a certain amount every year to be divided out among the several States conditionally; and it will take all the money the United States Government can appropriate, and all that we can raise by local taxation or issuing bonds, or whatever method we may choose. It is going to take a long time. The young men are coming on, and it is to the future that I am looking.

EXCESSIVE COST OF TRANSPORTATION OVER PUBLIC HIGHWAYS.

It is a remarkable fact that the cost of transporting farm products over country roads is almost as great as it has been at any time during the last two generations. On the other hand, the cost of transportation over the railroads and over the deep waters has been diminished, so that we can ship produce very many times farther by this means than we could a few years ago. In other words, where we have substituted inanimate power for animal power there has been great progress, but there has been no great reduction in the cost of transportation by animal power over the common roads.

The report of the Ohio road commission of 1893 was the first official document ever published in this or any other country calling attention to the slight progress made in reducing cost of transportation by animal power as compared with the progress made in every other field of development, and stating that the average cost per ton per mile is 25 cents under the prevailing system by animal power.

This figure was arrived at by data gathered from the long hauls in Mexico and in the United States from the Missouri River across the plains to the Pacific coast; and short hauls in various counties of Ohio from 5 to 8 miles, upon such material as lumber, wood, and timber, and the agricultural products from the place of production to the railroad stations; and the still shorter hauls in large cities from boat landings and railroad terminals, from 1 to 5 miles, especially upon coal, lumber, stone, brick, and heavy building materials. In Mexico for hundreds of years their only means of transportation was that of animal power; and their cheapest rate between the city of Vera Cruz at the seacoast and the City of Mexico, a distance of 272 miles, was 26 cents per ton per mile. It is a remarkable fact that during the period of nearly four hundred years they were not able to reduce this rate of transportation below 26 cents per ton per mile, and it is a more remarkable fact that in our own country and in our own time, with all the improvements that we have made touching the means of production and the means of transportation for long distances, we have done but little better than our less enterprising neighbors in so far as transportation on the common roads is concerned.

The correctness of these figures upon the excessive cost of transportation by animal power has been challenged, but never successfully, and it affords me great pleasure to be able to present to you to-day a confirmation of these figures from the highest authority. About the same time that the official report of the Ohio road commission was made and published, in 1893, the Government of the United States, in pursuance to a law passed by Congress in March of that year, appointed Gen. Roy Stone as a special agent to gather data and report in reference to any and all matters pertaining to the cost of building roads and the cost of transportation over them. General Stone, in circular No. 19, states that after two years of investigation of this subject, with the aid of the Division of Statistics of the Department of Agriculture, reports have been gathered from 1,200 counties, giving the average length of haul, in miles, from farms to markets or shipping points, the average size of load hauled, and the average cost per ton per mile. The figures show that the average cost per ton per mile in the Eastern States is 32 cents; in the Northern States, 27 cents; in the Middle Southern States, 31 cents; in the cotton States, 25 cents; in the prairie States, 22 cents; in the Pacific coast and mountain States, 22 cents, and in the United States, 25 cents, thus confirming to a fraction the figures published in the report of the Ohio road commission in 1893.

I wish to emphasize the fact, from which there is no escape, that the rate of transportation over the common roads is and always has been excessively high, and that the improvement made from generation to generation and from century to century along that line has been very slight indeed, and all of the evidence from ancient history down to the most recent tests alike show a high rate and but slight improvement compared with the progress made in other departments of industry or by other means of transportation. Now, it being true, as I said before, that the value of land and the wages of labor are affected by the cost of transportation, we should expect to find that where so high a rate as 25 cents per ton per mile prevails, the land would diminish in value and that the rewards of labor bestowed upon such lands would grow less and less. What we should expect to find, we do find. It is not necessary for the careful observer to get his information through official reports by way of figures, for he can see before him the evidence of this excessive cost of transportation in the diminished price of land and the diminished rewards of labor bestowed upon it. The price of land decreases in almost inverse proportion to the distance over which the agricultural products must be transported by horsepower. The greater the distance, the less the value of the land and the less the reward of labor bestowed upon it.

In the Ohio report of 1893 the total amount of tonnage moved by horsepower in the United States for the year 1892 was estimated at 500,000,000 tons; the average distance at 8 miles. The cost of moving this tonnage, at 25 cents per ton per mile, would be $1,000,000,000, which was stated to be the cost of operating the wagon roads for one year.

These figures, though expressly stated to be estimates and approximations, have also been substantially confirmed by the investigations of the United States Government through the Office of Road Inquiry. The same circular to which I have referred gives the gross weight of the entire agricultural product of the year 1895 at 219,824,227 tons, to which is added 93,525,000 tons of wood and lumber, this latter item being one-fourth of the total product of the forests, and considered as that proportion of the whole, which is transported upon the public roads by animal power.

The agricultural products consumed upon the farms are offset by other items transported to the farms, such as building materials, coal, farm machinery, and merchandise, so that the total agricultural product is considered as equivalent to the tonnage moved over the road. Adding these two items together—that is to say, the agricultural product and one-fourth of the forestry product—we have a total of 313,349,227 tons. The cost of transporting this gross tonnage over the average distance, which the circular states as 12.1 miles, at the average rate of 25 cents per ton per mile, makes $3.02 per ton, and the entire cost of moving this annual tonnage at that rate gives a grand total of $946,414,665.54. Supposing this could be moved at a cost of 10 cents per ton instead of 25 cents per ton per mile, the cost would then be $378,565,866, and the saving would be $567,848,799.54.

In this connection I quote the following from a letter of Mr. Stuyvesant Fish, president Illinois Central Railroad Company, to Governor Lowry, of Mississippi:

> Circular 19, Office of Road Inquiries, bears date April 4, 1896, and the grand total of the annual cost of hauling farm products and lumber on public roads in the United States, there given as $946,414,665, is based on data for the year ended June 30, 1895. In that year the gross sum received by all the railroads in the United States for not only hauling all freights, but for also providing in addition the highways (railroads), the vehicles (cars), the motive power (engines), and the drivers (trainmen), and paying taxes thereon, was only $729,998,462; that is to say, it cost the farmers and the lumbermen of the United States alone $216,421,203, or, say, 30 per cent more in one year to haul their products on public roads than all the railroads received for freights of all kinds.
> Obviously the farmers and the lumbermen have more to gain from good roads than from further reducing the excessively low rates of freight charged by the railroads, which must be given a living profit if they are to continue to develop the country. Moreover, 70 per cent of the gross receipts of the railroads are spent in taxes, labor, and material, while bad roads return nothing.

The difference in cost of transportion is illustrated by the following table, which shows how far $1.25 will pay for transporting a ton in four different ways. The table is based on the most careful estimates:

Cost of transportation per ton.

Horsepower, 5 miles	$1.25
Electric power, 25 miles	1.25
Steam cars, 250 miles	1.25
Steamships on the lakes, 1,000 miles	1.25

It will be seen that the same amount of money it takes to haul a given amount of produce 5 miles on a public highway of the United States will pay the freight for 250 miles on a railroad, and yet the railroad companies are never at rest in the matter of improving and repairing their highways. Let us devise some means to get the farmer to improve his.

Mr. Chairman, the above figures, I know, are great, beyond the power of any mind to fully conceive, and the benefits conferred upon the country must be equally great, provided we can substitute for the present costly method some more economical one. Save to our country the enormous cost of bad roads—that is economy! Good roads will save half a billion dollars every year!

I believe the only way we can secure good roads is through some system of cooperation like that explained above, in which the National Government, the State, the county, etc., all contribute their equitable proportion. I have abundant reasons for knowing that the sentiment of the whole country is in favor of such cooperation, and I am confindent that those who oppose it will be lost in the dust of progress!

Life and Character of the Late Hon. Reese C. De Graffenreid.

REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. BROUSSARD,

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, January 25, 1903,

On the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted, that the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of Hon. REESE C. DE GRAFFENREID, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Texas.

"Resolved, That, as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a faithful and distinguished public servant, the House at the conclusion of the memorial proceedings of this day shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk be, and is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased."

Mr. BROUSSARD said:

Mr. SPEAKER: We have met here to-day, according to a long-established and very proper custom of the House, to pay our respects to a departed brother who has gone from us.

REESE CALHOUN DE GRAFFENREID, a member of this Congress, died at the Riggs House on the 30th day of August, 1902, with scarcely a premonition of his coming dissolution. Our departed friend was born at Franklin, Tenn., in 1859. After attending various private schools, he matriculated at the University of Tennessee, and at the age of 19, after a four years' course at that famous institution, received his diploma. Subsequently, at the Lebanon Law School, he graduated in the profession of law, after which he practiced that profession at Franklin, Tenn., for a short time. He removed to Chattanooga and there continued the practice of his profession one year longer, and then removed to Texas.

In that State he was connected with the Texas and Pacific Railroad, then in course of construction, until 1883, when he resumed the practice of his profession at Longview, Tex., of which little city he was a resident at the time of his death.

He soon entered public life, and shortly after resuming his professional duties became the county attorney, which position he subsequently resigned. In 1888 he was one of the electors on the Democratic ticket. In 1890 he became a candidate for Congress, having as his opponents Hon. C. B. Kilgore and ex-Governor Hubbard. The canvass for the nomination was very thorough, the election resulting in the defeat of Mr. DE GRAFFENREID. Nothing daunted, in 1896 he again became a candidate for the Democratic nomination and secured it after a warm contest. He was then elected to the Fifty-fifth Congress, to the Fifty-sixth Congress, and to the present Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I entered service as a legislator in the Fifty-fifth Congress, at the same time Mr. DE GRAFFENREID'S career opened up in this House. I knew him intimately during all of his term of service. I have no desire to say of his services to his people, of his devotion to his family, and of his useful career aught that is not borne out by a strict adherence to the truth. He was a splendid specimen of manhood, strong, stout, and handsome, bearing himself like a true freeman, independent in thought, magnetic in every sense of the word; courageous, brave, and determined. These are the qualities which, among other good qualities too numerous to mention, marked him a distinguished man. He had opened before him a career full of possibilities, which made his untimely death the more regrettable to those who knew him well and were acquainted with his many fine qualities. He did not often address himself to the House, but when he did so attracted universal attention, presenting his facts in strong array, wielded a logic unanswerable, and was eloquent to a superlative degree. He was a great campaigner, was very impressive, both in appearance and in argument upon the stump, and caused those who were pitted against him continual fear of his masterly way of presenting public questions.

His reputation as a public speaker was not limited to his district, nor even to the territory which composes the State of his adoption, but from one end of his country to the other his prowess was known and recognized by all men who kept up with public business. He created as great an impression, as lasting a recollection of his ability, as a public speaker in the great metropolis of the United States that was not less than that which he had previously secured in the State of Texas. When on a memorable occasion Tammany Hall invited him to address the great body of Democrats who compose the Tammany Association on the Fourth of July, 1901, we all remember the magnificent outburst of enthusiasm that greeted his original and quaint way of presenting the cause of Democracy, the magnificent reception tendered him, and the splendid eulogy which the press of the country paid him for that address.

But it was not only in the capacity of a public speaker that we remember our departed friend. To those who knew him most intimately here, in his native State, and in the State of his adoption, it is because of his fine qualities that we most regret him. True to every friend, faithful to every trust, courageous in the extreme, he was never known to neglect the cause of any friend or of any principle, even to the detriment of his own personal interests. Devoted to a fond wife, whom he loved dearly, it was shocking in the extreme to learn of his death.

I saw him the eve of his death, with a splendid physique, manly bearing, and courtly manners. I could not surmise that at that time the Angel of Death was hovering about him ready to strike the fatal blow. None of his friends who saw him then, or who saw him a moment before his death, realized that his time had come. Always in good humor, he was particularly so on this occasion, complained of no ailment, but, on the contrary, confident in his splendid health, moved about attending to his business, little suspecting the near end. He was extremely fond of the society of his friends, which numbered scores. It seems the irony of fate that he should have died not only without premonition, but alone, away from his loved wife, apart from his many friends, in a room at a public hotel. This sudden death made his departure the more deplorable to his many friends. Indeed, in his case the truism that "in the midst of life we are in death" was preeminently illustrated.

From Washington he was borne to his old home in Longview, accompanied by sorrowing friends hastily got together immediately after his death, and there laid to rest in the land of his adoption.

While in the House he served on three committees, Territories, Railways and Canals, and Pensions, and on each of these did good and effective work for his country.

We mourn his loss as a man; we mourn his loss to the public service; we mourn his loss as a good husband; but more particularly do we mourn his loss as a true friend and a faithful adviser.

The Philippine Coinage Bill.

OF

HON. JOHN F. SHAFROTH,

OF COLORADO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, January 21, 1903.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 15520) to establish a standard of value and to provide a coinage system in the Philippine Islands—

Mr. SHAFROTH said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The position which I take upon this bill is different from those which have been expressed by preceding speakers. I am not in favor of the measure proposed by the majority, nor am I in favor of the measure proposed by the minority. The position which I take is that the currency now in the Philippine Islands is better for the Philippine people than either of those proposed, and therefore it is best to vote down both propositions.

Every attempt to remedy the little inconveniencies of their currency by the Philippine Commission has proven detrimental to the people, and this is simply another step which will produce more injury.

Mr. Chairman, all the evils that have been complained of as the result of the silver standard in the Philippine Islands are not proper to lay at the door of that system of currency. There has been great distress in the Philippine Islands, due to the drought, due to the failure of the crops, due to the locusts, due to the cholera, due to the bubonic plague, due to the rinderpest which destroyed nearly all their work animals. Some gentleman the other day, in speaking on the constabulary bill, seemed to think that all these disasters were due to the fact that the silver standard existed in the islands.

Mr. Chairman, the only way to prove whether this standard has caused the distress, whether it is the silver standard that works to the detriment of the people, is simply to inquire whether other silver-standard countries are progressing. I find in a magazine called The Protectionist, of December, 1902, a Republican paper of good standing, a statement relative to the condition in Mexico, and I must say that I was surprised to find the rapid progress being made in that Republic. I was surprised to find there a degree of prosperity, according to the figures given, that comparatively is even greater than that of the United States. While we have been doubling they have been quadrupling in development.

I find from this article that the bank assets increased between 1865 and 1901 from $1,000,000 to $270,000,000, an increase of 270 fold or 27,000 per cent. I find that the silver money deposited in banks rose from $500,000 in 1865 to $59,000,000 in 1901, 10,000 per cent. I find that the bank deposits in 1893 were $28,000,000, and in the year 1901 they were $104,000,000. I find a notation here to which I want to call the attention of my friends on the other side, and that is that "not a single bank has ever failed in Mexico." Such a record has never been made by any gold-standard nation of the world.

I insist the difficulties with the Philippine currency have resulted from the effort of the Commission by order to fix an arbitrary ratio between gold and silver by means other than open mints. It first fixed the ratio at 2 silver dollars for 1 gold dollar, but when the value of silver rose higher than 32 to 1, it produced the exportation of the silver Mexican dollars. The Commission then imposed an export duty of 10 per cent on Mexican dollars. That law necessitated the settlement of balances in gold. When silver sank in the world's market it became very remunerative to the Chinese bankers and brokers to ship in Mexican dollars and exchange two of them for a gold dollar. If the Philippine Commission had not attempted to regulate the value of silver dollars in gold but had left the value of the Mexican dollars to the market value of the same as is done in Mexico, in China, in Hongkong, and in the Straits Settlements, there would have been no serious difficulty in making exchanges with other countries.

Mr. Chairman, I want to read a little further of the marvelous degree of prosperity which the article says exists in the Republic of Mexico. The railroad mileage increased from 359 miles in 1873 to 10,100 miles in 1900, the increase being thirty-fold, or 3,000 per cent, yet the increase of mileage in the United States during the corresponding period has been less than 100 per cent. The Government revenues in the Republic of Mexico in the year 1881 were $30,466,093, and in 1900 they were $64,261,076.

There is nothing in this statement showing a want of revenue, nothing showing that under their system they can not meet the interest on the public debt and the payments due to public officers. But they have not had the locusts in that country; they have not had the rinderpest there; they have not experienced the loss of crops in the Philippines. Consequently, to charge that these disasters, these unfavorable conditions, resulted from the money standard prevailing there, is, it seems to me, absolutely contradicted by the fact that in the Republic of Mexico, under the same standard, the conditions have been exceedingly prosperous.

Each year the Mexican Government has about $6,000,000 surplus custom-house receipts, and the increase in those has been from $7,239,880 in 1870 to $24,000,000 in 1900. The increase has been nearly fourfold, or 400 per cent. The exports of the Republic of Mexico in 1885 were $46,670,845; in 1900, $150,056,360; and this under the same silver standard which it is claimed must necessarily produce disaster to any people.

The amount produced in mining in 1885 was $40,000,000; in 1900 it was $100,000,000, showing an increase of 150 per cent in the last twenty years. We find that the postal service has increased correspondingly. In 1877 the post-offices and agencies were 322; in 1900, 2,511. In the last ten years, as this report shows, the exports have more than doubled, while the imports have increased 80 per cent. It took the United States twenty-three years to double her exports, and it was claimed that the increase was marvelous.

In the last five years the paid-up bank capital grew from $23,000,000 to $61,000,000, an increase of $38,000,000. The discounts increased from $47,000,000 to $125,000,000; the bank-note circulation from $37,000,000 to $63,000,000. I say that a corresponding amount of increase has not been made in this country, which is supposed to be the greatest, the most prosperous country on the face of the globe.

Not only that, but I want to call the attention of the committee to this remarkable statement "Business failures are rare, not exceeding ten yearly in the last years." I ask gentlemen who are charging all kinds of disasters to the silver standard. Where is there a record to compare with Mexico's? Where is there any corresponding portion of the United States in wealth or population which has not had more than ten failures in a year? Yet that is the condition existing in the Republic of Mexico.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with these facts before us, it seems to me we can not charge the financial disturbances existing over in the Philippines to the standard that they have. The trouble is due to something else; and that something else is the disasters which any country will experience when it has famine, when it has loss of crops, when it has fatal epidemics.

It is on this account that we should let things alone. We have no business to impose upon the Philippine people either the provisions of this bill or the United States currency, because there are dangers in each alternative. In my judgement there is less danger in imposing upon those people the currency of the United States. I do not believe that from this course as many evils will result as from the passage of the bill of the majority of the committee. Yet at the same time I recognize that when we impose the gold standard upon the Philippine people serious difficulties and disasters are likely to occur.

The chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs has cited as a model the currency of India. He has said that this bill proposes to give to the Philippine people the same kind of currency which is imposed in India. If so, Mr. Chairman, I pity the people of those islands. He has selected a very poor example for us to follow. Prominent statesmen in the British Parliament are divided now upon the question whether the currency adopted for India is or is not a good currency.

Some of the very ablest men of Great Britain have been opposed and are opposed now to the adoption of the gold standard in India and the attempt to secure for the rupee an artificial value. And the reason of their objection is that the system which has been adopted imposes upon those people a managed currency instead of an automatic currency. An automatic currency is regarded by all financiers as the ideal currency. It can only be secured by an open mint. The United States has it through the free coinage of gold, and the silver-standard countries obtain it by open mints for silver. The imposition of a fixed or a managed currency is always regarded as detrimental to the interests of a people.

I want to read from one or two authorities in England relative to this model which is presented to us. I want to show that such men as directors of the Bank of England say that it is not a proper system, and I wish to call attention to the statement which was made by the Right Honorable Lord Aldenham, a director of the Bank of England, with respect to the Indian currency. He said:

It is to my mind a necessity of a good standard that it should be automatic; that the needs of commerce should be supplied by commerce itself. Now, in the place of that, the closing of the Indian mints substituted a managed currency. Instead of being automatic, you may say it was autocratic; the Government has under the present system and would have under the proposed system, to settle what amount of currency is needed for the people. It should regulate itself by the needs of commerce. The currency existing in rupees is divorced from the metallic value of the rupee and is dependent only on the face value. It is, in fact, a forced currency, a debased currency.

Mr. George Handasyde Dick, president of the Chamber of Commerce and Manufactures in the city of Glasgow, Scotland, in December, 1901, published a statement with relation to the Indian currency which contains the following:

The foregoing are horns of the dilemma upon which the currency policy of India is impaled.

The first is, all history and experience show that there is nothing so detrimental to the progress and well-being of a nation as an artificial currency "managed" and unduly limited. This is illustrated to-day by the prosperity enjoyed by the silver-currency countries where the currency is allowed to expand automatically in comparison with the present agricultural and commercial adversities of India with her limited currency. It is also illustrated by the recent phenomenal prosperity in America, following upon an increase in her legal-tender money, since March of last year, of about $200,000,000.

Mexico is said to be sufferng from scarcity of her coin, due to an unusual demand for it from the Far East. The other dilemma is that the government of India dare not allow its silver currency to increase without check, because any such considerable increase might at once upset the exchange between India and London.

It is therefore submitted that the present policy of the Indian government to maintain India's foreign exchanges by limiting the supply of the only metal money which India will circulate is subversive of India's interests.

The two objects aimed at are incompatible with one another, and mutually destructive.

* * * * * * *

Even with the gold currency which Japan had its export has completely disorganized her trade. Consider the prosperity of China's trade now, with her unrestricted silver money, in comparison with the position in Japan. China has recently paid an enormous indemnity to Japan, and stands bound to pay an enormous indemnity to the allied countries who recently attacked her; but her trade continues good.

* * * * * * *

From what appears in the earlier part of this paper, it is failure and not success that has attended the attempt to set up a gold standard and currency in India.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that when people such as a director of the Bank of England, such as the president of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Glasgow, make statements that the attempt to impose a gold standard upon India has proven a failure and against the interests of the people, that we ought to hesitate as to what steps we are going to take in imposing a similar currency upon the people of the Philippine Islands.

I want to call attention to the fact that there was a hearing before the Senate committee last year and that the parties who presented themselves before that committee were men who represented banks and who represented large commercial houses in the Orient, and that the majority of that committee agreed that it would be better for the United States even to set up an open mint for the Philippines than to establish a gold standard there in the way of adopting the currency of the United States or of adopting the provisions contained in the plan of Mr. Conant.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the proposition which I make does not go to that extent. The proposition which I make is to let things alone. What is involved in the question of a currency in the Philippine Islands? It is purely a question of exchange, not as between the people of the islands, which constitutes 95 per cent of their business, because the peso circulates there freely; but the difficulty comes in foreign trade, which constitutes not 5 per cent of their commerce. Why impose upon a people a system of currency for the benefit of 5 per cent of their trade when it is likely to produce results detrimental to 95 per cent of the same?

If we adopt the majority bill, in order to maintain the parity between gold and silver in the islands it will be necessary either to maintain a large gold reserve or unduly limit the silver coins. If the gold reserve is maintained, it will have to be a large one, as the imports to the islands exceed the exports by seven to nine millions a year, all of which will have to be settled in gold. It puts the Philippine government into the banking business, with all the evils of an endless chain upon the gold reserve. If the parity of the metals is maintained by limiting the silver coins to such an extent as to raise the value thereof to gold at the ratio of 32 to 1, as they did in India, then we will have an inadequate currency for those people, which is bound to produce distress and disaster.

If we adopt the minority bill, it forces the United States currency upon a people which have had a different standard, as by that currency the silver dollar is greatly overvalued. It can not be used in the settlement of balances, and consequently the balances of trade will have to be settled in gold. The Philippine Islands, by reason of the Mexican dollar being a legal tender therein, have an automatic currency through the open mint in Mexico, which responds to the demands of commerce. The substituting therefor of a fixed or managed currency such as is proposed will, in my judgment, be detrimental to the people of those islands.

Life and Character of the Late Hon. Reese Calhoun De Graffenreid.

REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES L. SLAYDEN,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, January 25, 1903,

On the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted, the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of Hon. REESE C. DE GRAFFENREID, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Texas.

"Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a faithful and distinguished public servant, the House at the conclusion of the memorial proceedings of this day shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk be, and is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased."

Mr. SLAYDEN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Three times in less than eighteen months death has invaded the ranks of the Texas delegation in Congress.

In June, 1901, Judge R. E. Burke, of Dallas, while still hardly beyond the meridian of life, was called to the other side of the "great divide." His loss to the State and to the delegation was a great one. He was a painstaking, hard-working public servant whose judicial and legislative career had always been controlled by high and patriotic purposes. While his service in Congress was brief he had made his presence felt, and it gratifies me as his friend, when I go about the Departments of the Government, to hear him still affectionately and admiringly spoken of.

In August, 1902, REESE CALHOUN DE GRAFFENREID, another highly honored servant of the people of the State of Texas and of the whole country, died very suddenly in this city.

His unexpected death was an indescribable shock to his friends in and out of the State of Texas. His person was so powerful, and his nature so buoyant, that it seemed impossible to associate him with the idea of death. Cast in such an heroic physical mold and elevated to high political station while still a young man, his friends had every reason to believe that there lay before him a long, brilliant, and useful career.

It was my sad privilege to attend his funeral at the little town of Longview. I was impressed with the idea that the whole community had turned out to pay a last tribute of respect to their dead Representative. On his coffin there fell the tears of hundreds of his grief-stricken neighbors. From every farm and home for miles around the people poured into Longview by the thousand to bid a last farewell to one whom they had so loved and honored in life. Little children were there in great numbers, their innocent faces bearing the most sincere testimony to the affectionate memory they had for their friend who had gone forever.

Often in his life I had observed the tender and affectionate manner which characterized his intercourse with children. They all seemed to love and instinctively to trust him. And little children rarely make mistakes in their estimates of their elders. Since the Master said "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not" they have almost unerringly been able to pick people who have those sterling qualities of the heart and mind that are the essentials of character in the best men.

The bravest are the tenderest,
The loving are the daring.

Such was my friend REESE DE GRAFFENREID.

My colleagues who have preceded me have referred to the life and history of Mr. DE GRAFFENREID. I will not undertake to do, therefore, in my poor way what they have done so well.

Suffice it to say that the forbears of our friend were the State builders who in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries braved the hard conditions of life and fought Indians and foreign enemies in Virginia, North Carolina, and Tennessee. He was also the descendant of those brave and virtuous people, the Huguenots, who left France for conscience sake and who brought with them to this country, as they had taken it to Great Britain, a degree of culture and a knowledge of the fine arts possessed by no other class of immigrants. Having the blood of such sires in his veins, it was quite natural that he in turn should seek the frontier. In comparatively early life he went to Texas, where he played a man's part in the upbuilding of the civilization of that matchless Commonwealth.

Although trained to a profession, he was forced by the hard conditions of iron fortune to take any honest employment that offered. He considered himself fortunate when he secured work as a laborer on a railway then being constructed. From that honorable and useful work he went, in time, into the higher service of the people. In the rôle of laborer and equally in that of statesman he worthily did his whole duty. His experience illustrates the truth of the poet who said:

Honor and fame from no condition rise;
Act well your part, there the honor lies.

The Trusts.

SPEECH

OF

HON. FRANCIS M. GRIFFITH,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 7, 1903,

On the bill (H. R. 17) requiring all corporations engaged in interstate commerce to file returns with the Secretary of the Treasury, disclosing their true financial condition, and of their capital stock, and imposing a tax upon such as have outstanding capital stock unpaid in whole or in part.

Mr. GRIFFITH said:

Mr. SPEAKER: If anything more were needed to demonstrate the utter insincerity and impotency of the Republican party in its wonderful campaign against the trusts, the record of this session would supply the omission.

From first to last, this Republican antitrust campaign has been "all talk and no cider." It has been a mere pow-wow of noise fit only to amuse children, a silly and impudent device to deceive and hoodwink voters. The farce may be said to have begun in 1900, when the Republican House passed its antitrust bill with the understanding that the Senate would shelve it, and it was shelved accordingly. Then the President and his Attorney-General make a great show of opposing and prosecuting the trusts, acting on the principle of hunting bears with a brass band, and very few bears have they subjected to any inconvenience by this method; in fact, the bears seem to enjoy the excitement of the chase quite as much as the hunters do, and their health and prosperity seem to increase under the process. The same two officials next come to Congress with a great flourish of trumpets, and with an elaborate programme of antitrust legislation which they ask to have adopted. The Republican leaders then go into solemn conclave and produce various antitrust bills—all of them labeled "administration measures"—which we are assured will meet the emergency, and the country has been all agog during the whole winter in awaiting the awful carnage among the trusts that would ensue.

And behold! the mountain has labored and has brought forth a mouse. What is the net result of all this solemn, ominous Republican campaign against the trusts? It is proposed to expedite trust cases in the courts, to punish the giving and receiving of rebates, and to secure "publicity" by establishing a new bureau of the Government. Only this, and nothing more.

The proposition to expedite cases is all well enough, but it can not be called antitrust legislation. It is simply an oiling of the machinery of the law. The antirebate provision is degraded into a piece of buffoonery and an insult to the intelligence of the people by coupling with it a proviso that corporations may testify against themselves without fear of inculpating themselves. In other words, all that a corporation has to do in order to escape punishment is to confess that it is guilty.

Then, as to "publicity," this new bureau of the Government, with a full roster of well-paid officials—the heathen can not be converted, you know, without a liberal expenditure of money in the good cause—this bureau, I say, is to be solemnly charged with the duty of making "diligent investigation" of the business of the trusts, and after "diligently investigating" and "collecting information" the bureau must tell the President what it has found out, and then he must tell Congress what additional legislation he thinks might be advisable.

In brief, that brings us, after all this fuss and feathers, back just to the point where we are now. Why do we need more "information" about the trusts? Do we not know now enough about them, and more than enough? What the Attorney-General needs is not more information, but more power to his elbow. More stringent laws might be desirable, but the greatest need is for officials who will honestly and strenuously administer the laws as they now are. I believe that if we had a Democratic President and Congress the present laws would be found sufficient for curbing the trusts. The trouble is that the leaders of the dominant party do not want to curb the trusts. That is the milk in that cocoanut.

It is proposed that this puissant new bureau be invested with powers coordinate with those of the Interstate Commerce Commission. That sounds well. But the burden of the song of the Interstate Commerce Commission ever since it was born has been that it has no adequate power for carrying out its aims and its decrees; and this is an undoubted fact. So now this new bureau, which is to deliver Israel out of all his troubles, is to be only a kind of second edition of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and as powerless as that body for effecting needed reforms. Really I see no advantage to be derived from this bureau, except the advantage derived by the officials attached to it. They will have the advantage of drawing their salaries, and it looks very much as if that were the only reason for creating the bureau.

The pretended anxiety of the Republican leaders to curb the trusts is enough to make a horse laugh. The trusts and the Republican party organization constitute a business partnership—a combination, a trust in itself, and the biggest trust of them all—greater even than the steel trust, which is the richest and bulkiest beneficiary of the great Republican political trust, to be sure, but only one beneficiary among many. The trusts were the main support of the Republican party in the last campaign and in the campaign before that, and but for their aid the Republicans would doubtless have been beaten. Without their aid they will surely be beaten in 1904. Is it natural, is it fair, to suppose that the Republican party will deliberately commit suicide by injuring, curbing, and "going back on" the trusts? What is the Republican party for, anyway? Practically, is not its only "mission" to uphold and take care of the high protective tariff? And is not that just what the trusts want? All they ask is to be let alone themselves and to have the tariff let alone. Surely that is reasonable enough from a Republican point of view. That leaves the Republicans with nothing to do but "stand pat"—"stand pat" on the tariff and "stand pat" on the trusts.

Nothing but that? Oh, yes; there is one thing more that they feel obliged to do, and that is to pretend to curb the trusts. That they find really quite hard. It bothers them a good deal, and is really quite a nuisance. Not having any heart or sincerity in the matter, their efforts in that direction have naturally proved a failure. They earnestly wish the people would not make such a fuss about the trusts. Are not the trusts the people's best friends? Do they not give employment to everybody? Have they not produced the present unparalleled prosperity? Do they not help to keep the grand old party in power?

We might offer a few more conundrums. Do not the trusts monopolize the production of practically every article of common need? Do they not stifle all competition and control all prices and wages? Do they not sell their products lower to foreign buyers in foreign markets than to our own people in the home markets?

Do they not make our people pay them as extra profits the full measure of the tariff protection on those products? Do not they declare dividends of 10, 25, 50 per cent, and do not their managers become multimillionaires and billionaires on the money thus extorted from the poor people of this country? Have they not corrupted legislatures and courts and prevented the execution of the laws and of verdicts against them by bribes and by the ingenious perversions and quibblings of their hired attorneys, who are the ablest lawyers obtainable? Do they not own the Republican party, the party now in power, body, soul, and breeches? Do they not own a large part of the capital of the country and control absolutely the majority of its industrial interests? Is there not danger that if their present power should be allowed to keep on extending itself it might result ere long in controlling absolutely the nation and National Government, as it even now does practically, to a great extent?

Oh, what a humbug it is for the Republican party to go through the motions of attacking the trusts! The tariff is the mother of the trusts. Attack the trusts through the tariff. That is the best way. Reduce the tariff. Cut down the items on which the trusts fatten. Then the people will be able to get the benefits flowing from competition, of which they are now artificially deprived. There will still be revenue enough for the Government. Our expenditures last year, lavish as they were, amounted to only $593,000,000, while our receipts were $684,000,000, thus leaving a surplus of over $91,000,000, or an amount equal to about two-fifths of our total customs receipts for that year. In other words, two-fifths of our tariff duties last year were unnecessary for the support of the Government, and they only served to support the trusts and rob the people of their money for the benefit of the trusts. Surely the tariff could be cut down that much anyway without harm to the Government. But any suggestion to that effect gives the Republican managers a severe attack of heart disease. "Oh, no," they exclaim, "you must not touch the tariff." Why not? Why should we not reduce it at least a third or two-fifths, in the light of the figures of last year? It would not hurt the Government, would it? No, but it would hurt the trusts, or it would hurt the Republican party, which is the same thing.

Let us look at some of the items more in detail. The average rate of duty on dutiable imports, as levied last year, was within a very small fraction of 50 per cent. It was over 49 per cent. Expressed exactly, it was 49.78 per cent. Call it 50 per cent for convenience. I have not figured it out as to the amounts of all the different articles imported, but on the basis of the average rate of duty we could have cut down the tariff so that the average rate should be 32 per cent, instead of 50 per cent, and still had enough to meet all the needs of the Government last year. Of course that calculation ignores the needs of the trusts and of the Republican party, which I acknowledge are very great, but the question is whether the people ought to be obliged to supply these needs out of their own pockets. I am inclined to think not, and the people are inclined to think not.

The people will be wise if they carry on their thinking a little further. Let them cogitate a while on such questions as these:

Why should a plain American citizen in ordinary circumstances be taxed with a duty amounting to 17 per cent on oil to enable the Standard Oil trust to pay annual dividends of 50 per cent? Of course we are in favor of the endowment of universities by Mr. Rockefeller, but we really can not afford to supply the funds for their endowment by being forced to pay an additional cent per gallon for oil just because coal is scarce.

Why should we pay $28 a ton for steel rails to the steel trust, when the same trust sells similar rails to an English customer for $23? Is it fair to squeeze money out of us in this way, even if the money be devoted by Mr. Carnegie to the founding of public libraries?

Why should we pay 59 per cent more than we ought to for our window glass, in order to allow the window-glass trust to make 15 per cent on their investment?

Since the passage of the Dingley tariff law the salt trust has put up the price of our salt 100 per cent. Where is the justice of that?

Where is the sense or justice in giving the borax trust a tariff protection of 158 per cent, and thus enabling it to charge us 8 cents a pound for borax, while it sells the same article abroad at 2½ cents a pound?

Why should the American farmer pay $65 for a farm wagon similar to one that the same manufacturer sells in the foreign market for $39?

Tell me why a sewing machine of American make that costs our American housewives $45 is sold in London and Paris for $27?

These are some of the questions which the American citizen and voter might ask himself with profit, and by reflecting upon them he would naturally be led to the correct solution of the whole problem. That solution will be reached by the transfer of the governmental power to the Democratic party, and in no other way can it be reached. Reform and Republicanism are incompatible terms. The Republican party can not reform because it does not want to reform. Reform would be death to it. Its very existence depends on the continuance of these very elements of corrupt, unfair, unjust, rapacious, un-American, mean, contemptible favoritism which have made the trusts possible and which have insured their success.

Their success! Their success is the shame and the scandal of the country and of Christendom. Their success has been gained by the sacrifice of American manhood and independence, and the prostitution of every pure, patriotic impulse in the American breast. But it will be asked, Are you in favor of utterly exterminating the trusts? Not if they can be rendered as harmless to the public as the companies and firms which they have supplanted.

I welcome any and all measures, emanating from whatever source, which will tend to diminish and abate the evils flowing from the trusts. But the point I have been endeavoring to emphasize is that no measure emanating from an authoritative Republican source can be expected to be of any real effect in curbing the trusts, because the Republican leaders do not wish or intend to curb the trusts, and that any radical, effective, and permanent remedy for these evils must emanate from Democratic sources, and can be administered effectively only by Democratic administrators. I have introduced a bill to revise the tariff in such a way as to place paints, varnishes, oils, cement, lime, plaster, glass, metals, lumber, meat, pulp, paper, books, coal, leather, and all farm implements on the free list, and thus to take away from the trusts now controlling all these articles the extra profit afforded by the tariff, but the bill sleeps in the pigeonholes of the Ways and Means Committee, and the measure can not be brought to a vote because the trusts wish otherwise.

Let Democrats vote for this little milk-and-water measure, by all means, if they wish to. Let them vote for this, that, and the other "publicity" measure, by all means, if they wish to. Much do the trusts care about these "publicity" measures, by the way! How they do laugh at them! By all means let the various "Administration measures," all and several, have the benefit of Democratic support. These measures may not do any harm, although they will not do any good. But the best way to attack the trusts and to cope with their evils is for the Democrats and the honest, patriotic citizens of this country generally to begin now, at this moment, an earnest, strong campaign for the overthrow of the Republican party next year. With a Democratic Congress and a Democrat—a genuine Democrat—in the White House the satisfactory solution of the trust question will be assured, and it can not be assured or attained in any other way. And I believe the people are silently and irresistibly forming an intention to vote that way in November, 1904. [Applause.]

OF

HON. ARIOSTO A. WILEY,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, January 25, 1903,

On the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted that the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of Hon. REESE C. DE GRAFFENREID, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Texas.

"Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a faithful and distinguished public servant, the House at the conclusion of the memorial procedings of this day shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk be, and is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased"—

Mr. WILEY said:

Mr. SPEAKER: A veil hangs over the face of the statue of Isis, with this inscription: "I am that which is, has been, and shall be. No mortal can ever lift my veil."

Death lays his cold fingers upon us, claims us as his own, and to the pale realm of shade bears us as his prey. With an unpitying rap he will be heard in turn knocking at the door of us all. We can not tear his veil asunder. We die and go away without ever having penetrated his mysteries.

Another of our brothers, REESE CALHOUN DE GRAFFENREID, has paid to nature her last great debt, and gone from this strange world "no more to linger where the sunbeams must fade." In the enjoyment of robust health, in the pride of vigorous manhood, he was cut off, like a flower in full bloom. His hands are folded. His lips are closed. These walls shall hear his voice no more forever. His sun went down before its setting, "not darkened, but no longer seen." He has glided away from amongst his earthly labors to a life beyond, "where the rainbow never fades, and where the stars are spread out like the islands that slumber on the sea."

One sentiment pervades and depresses us all. It is that of sincere sorrow at the death of this splendid man. Yet he is not wholly dead. He lives in our affectionate remembrance and esteem, as well as in the efficient services he rendered, and the good he accomplished here and elsewhere. Our bereavement is not shut up in his tomb. We need not weep in secret, for we enjoy the tender privilege, here and now, of pouring out our loves and griefs and tears over his newly made grave.

I knew the distinguished dead intimately and well. It was my pleasure to serve with him, not only on the floor of the House, but in the performance also of the many routine duties of the committee room during the long session of the Fifty-seventh Congress. My acquaintance ripened into a deep attachment for him. He was a just, generous, liberal-minded, big-hearted magnanimous man. A manlier man I never knew.

Painstaking, courteous, loyal, chivalrous, he toiled faithfully, not only for the people of the Congressional district he had the honor to represent in this Chamber and of the adopted State in which he lived, but also for whatever he conceived to be to the best interests of the whole country, regardless of boundary lines and irrespective of party affiliations.

Self-reliant, able, and strong, equipped with a high order of talent, a trained and disciplined intellect, he was essentially a useful man. His energy was tireless, his integrity stainless. Patient in the conquest of details, with a determination to succeed, he could not and would not occupy a position of mediocrity. He literally compelled success, and leaped quickly into the arena of an active and lucrative law practice, which he willingly sacrificed in order to serve at the national capital a constituency which delighted to honor him. The people, ever ready to appreciate and reward merit, thrice elected him a member of this body, and he died here in the city of Washington, at his post of duty, while serving the sixth year of his term as Representative from the third district of Texas. Let us cherish the hope that he is not really dead, but only departed; that he has left us but for a little while to go down "into his garden to gather spices; to feed in his garden, and gather lilies."

His greatest triumphs were achieved in political contests, for which his natural endowments preeminently fitted him. Physically courageous and "intellectually pugnacious," he was in forensic debate combative—sometimes astutely aggressive. A devoted friend, an uncompromising adversary, with a temperament eminently positive, he intrepidly attacked or resolutely defended any position he was called on either to assault or to maintain. Reared among the people, he was familiar with their struggles and acquainted with their needs. Possessing a rare facility and grace of speech, endowed with the gift of clear analysis and the power of convincing logic, he neither feared disaster in a cause he believed to be right nor failed, when occasion required, to display the lofty courage of his convictions in respect to any matter demanding consideration at his hands.

He never professed, while living, to be an infallible man, free from every human fault and frailty. Indeed, his record abounded in romantic lights and shadows. He was not a Pecksniff or a Robert Beaufort—those hypocritical characters, so graphically pictured in works of fiction by the brilliant pens of Dickens and Bulwer. He was not one of those "rigidly righteous," "holier than thou" men of decorous phase and heartless action, who conspicuously observe the hollow forms and empty conventionalities of polite society, and, while careful not ever to offend the proprieties of a thinly veneered life, never do a brave, benevolent, or unselfish act. Such men are wholly incapacitated to sit in judgment upon the shortcomings of their brethren, because they are either ignorant of their natures or strangers to their weaknesses. They are never merciful. Their verdicts are always harsh. Like the unjust creditor described in the Bible, they are ever ready to take a victim by the throat and mutter through their well-set teeth, "Pay me that thou owest." They forget what the poet has so prettily said:

A little word in kindness spoken,
A smile, a sympathizing tear,
Has often healed the heart that's broken, and might also have added—and proven the strongest helping hand, outstretched in a moment of peril to lead back an erring son of humanity to the straight, sure paths of virtue and of peace.

A wise man once aptly declared, "Those who exclude are really the excluded." Those who seek capriciously or unjustly to "cast out" others from the holy temple ofttimes find themselves the ones who are actually cast out. He was not his "brother's keeper." He condemned no mortal without a hearing. There was nothing pharisaical in the blended elements which entered into his mental, moral, and physical make-up. He was not addicted to external forms and ceremonies. For all manner of shams and false pretense he had a haughty contempt.

If he did not make the show, he had nevertheless the spirit of that broad, catholic philanthropy which recognizes the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. His earthly career was pitched on a high plane, above creeds and beyond doctrines. He was a magnetic gentleman, slow to anger, prompt to respond to all appeals for neighborly kindness, and quick to dispense God-like charity in relieving the poor.

But he is gone! Across the threshold of this Hall the tread of his footsteps will never be heard again. We have borne him to his grave. Gathered about his bier, let us remember and emulate his many virtues. The fairest funeral wreath we can now lay on his coffin is to imitate his good deeds. Let our thoughts of him be associated with all that is pleasant and genial and warm-hearted and noble and brave and true. Impressed, too, with this solemn occasion, we may learn a useful lesson from the words of the Psalmist:

Lord, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days what it is, that I may know how frail I am.

The Department of Commerce and Labor.

SPEECH
OF
HON. D. LINN GOOCH,
OF KENTUCKY,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Saturday, January 17, 1903,

On the bill (S. 569) to create a new executive department of the Government to be known as the department of commerce and labor.

Mr. GOOCH said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The growth of the commerce of the country has been so marvelously great and its continued development is so desirable that there is a well-recognized demand for the creation of a department to be headed by a secretary of commerce. Let me give some of the facts and figures showing the growth and importance of our commerce. The industries in the United States have grown in number from 3,908,677 in the year 1870 to 11,891,220 in the year 1900. Our manufactures have grown from $1,885,861,676 in 1860 to $13,014,287,498 in the year 1900, and the mileage of our railroads has grown from 30,626 in the year 1860 to 194,321 in the year 1900. The tonnage of American vessels engaged in domestic trade in the year 1860 was 2,807,631 and in 1900 4,338,145. In the year 1860 American vessels engaged in the trade on the Great Lakes represented, in tons, 467,774, and in the year 1900, 1,565,587. And I might, Mr. Chairman, go on and furnish a long list of other items showing the material development and industrial growth of our country, but I will content myself by calling attention to these items:

	1860.	1900.
Merchandise:
Imports	$353,616,119	$849,941,184
Exports	$333,576,057	$1,394,483,082
Gold and silver:
Imports	$8,550,135	$79,829,486
Exports	$66,546,239	$104,979,034
Manufactures of iron and steel:
Imports	$21,526,594	$20,478,728
Exports	$5,703,024	$121,913,548
Cotton:
Imports of raw cotton.....pounds..	2,005,529	67,398,521
Exports of domestic cotton .....do...	1,767,686,338	3,100,583,188
Receipts from customs	$53,187,512	$233,164,871

Our population in 1860 was upward of 31,000,000, and this year it is estimated to be upward of 87,000,000. Property values, real and personal, have grown from $16,159,616,000 in the year 1860 to $94,300,000,000 in the year 1900.

The total number of depositors in savings banks in 1860 was 693,870; in 1900, 6,107,083. We have no record of the total deposits in banks in 1860, but in 1880 they amounted to $2,306,000,000; in 1890, $3,998,000,000, and in 1900 to $7,464,000,000.

The number of farms in 1860 was 2,044,077; in 1890, 4,564,641, and in 1900, 5,739,657.

The total value of farm animals was, in 1860, $1,089,329,915, and in 1900, $2,981,722,945.

The total value of farm products was, in 1870, $1,958,030,927, and in 1900, $3,764,177,706.

Our exports of domestic cotton in 1860 amounted to 1,767,686,338 pounds, but after the abolition of slave labor the amount of export cotton fell, in 1870, to 958,358,523 pounds.

For the fiscal year of 1902 our exports of domestic cotton amounted to 3,500,778,763 pounds.

These facts are given as a part of the argument of the committee to show the importance and necessity for this proposed department of commerce. I do not wish to detract from its importance, but, Mr. Chairman, my criticism of this bill is that it does not go far enough. It should have created a department of labor, with a Cabinet officer in full possession of all the information pertaining to labor in our country and in touch with the laboring people throughout our land.

The party to which I owe allegiance, the great Democratic party, in its platform adopted in its last national convention put forth this declaration:

In the interest of American labor and the uplifting of the workingman as the corner stone of the prosperity of our country, we recommend that Congress create a department of labor, in charge of a secretary with a seat in the Cabinet, believing that the elevation of the American laborer will bring with it increased prosperity to our country at home and to our commerce abroad.

This bill, instead of giving to labor an independent organization, with a Cabinet officer at its head, proposes to put that department under the supervision and control of a secretary of commerce. The platform demand, which has just been read, is not satisfied by the bill here proposed, nor will the thoughtful laboring people of the country be satisfied with this measure.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the framers of this bill had been as ready to recognize the claim of labor as they have been anxious to meet the demands of commerce, I would have said nothing in this debate. Let me be not misunderstood. I am willing to listen to the appeal of the commercial interests of the country, but I insist that the labor interests be given a fair showing in the pending bill. I shall, therefore, support the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON], which will be offered at the proper time, to recommit this bill with instructions to the committee to report back a bill creating a department of commerce and a department of labor, each with a Cabinet officer.

That this course is in the interest of the public welfare ought not to be questioned. We now have a Secretary of the Treasury and a consular service to look after the commercial interests. We have the Labor Bureau, charged with the duty of caring for as near as may be the labor interests. If commerce is so important as to need a separate department, we can with equal justice demand that labor be accorded a member in the President's official family. Foreign relations, finances, law, interior affairs, post-offices and post-roads, and agriculture each have an adviser to the President. Let us authorize one for commerce and one for labor.

Mr. Chairman, we should not fail to incorporate into this bill a provision for a secretary of labor. The labor interests of the country have been seeking this much for more than thirty years. They now repeat the request. I read you the letter of Mr. Gompers, the president of the American Federation of Labor:

JANUARY 20.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,
President pro tempore United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: The bill pending before your honorable body, Senate bill 569, is, as you know, to establish a department of commerce, with the creation of an office to be known as secretary of the department of commerce. A perusal of the bill shows that it proposes to transfer the Department of Labor to the proposed department of commerce, and it is to this particular feature to which your attention is respectfully directed.

As you know, the Bureau of Labor Statistics was created at the earnest solicitation of the organized labor movement of America, and subsequently changed to the higher position of the Department of Labor. This, too, in response to the earnest request of the American Federation of Labor, and the hope has been long entertained that time would demonstrate the wisdom of an independent executive department and its chief officer a secretary with a voice in the councils of the President affecting matters particularly relating to the great interests of labor.

No keen observer disputes that the all-absorbing and burning question of our time is expressed in the terms, the labor question. In the effort to establish the rightful relation of the workers to society, in the production of wealth, and in its just distribution is encompassed all the complex questions of our lives.

That justice should be meted out to all the workers no thoughtful man will deny.

Anything which is not based upon ethical considerations for all no intelligent trades-unionist asks.

Questions often arise in the official family of the President of the United States in which justice, fair dealing, ethics, and the law and its administration must frequently be under consideration, and unless there is some representative of the workers competent to speak in their name, to advocate their cause, to convey to the Executive head and his advisers the laborers' side of labor's contention, he and they must be deprived of valuable and far-reaching information. It is to supply this present deficiency that the American Federation of Labor has asked, and should repeat and increase its efforts to secure, the enactment by Congress of a law creating a department of labor, with a secretary who shall have a seat in the President's Cabinet.

The creation of a department of commerce with the provision for the subordination of the Department of Labor will minimize the importance of labor's interests and minimize the present Department of Labor. Against such a procedure, in the name of American labor, I enter my most solemn protest.

There can be no question that the members of a President's Cabinet are representatives of the employers' and business men's side of industry, commerce, and finance. Our ambassadors and consuls to foreign countries are agents and advocates of the same interests, and there can be no good reason for the creation of a department of commerce, particularly when the Department of Labor, which was created for a particular purpose in no way germane to a department of commerce, and which it is purposed shall be absorbed thereby to the detriment of the interests of all our people.

It is therefore urgently requested that in the event that the honorable Senate should deem it wise to enact Senate bill No. 569, that the Department of Labor, as now constituted, may be eliminated from its provisions. I trust, too, that you may extend the courtesy of submitting this communication to the Senate of the United States.

I have the honor to remain, yours, very truly,

SAMUEL GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

Mr. Tracy, the representative of the American Confederation of Labor, and Mr. Fuller, the representative of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and kindred organizations, made request for a secretary of labor. And these and others identified with the labor interests went further than this and protested against the merger of the Department of Labor into the department of commerce. They justly claimed that such course or merger would not best subserve the interests of labor, and in effect that this measure would not be an advance of the position now held by labor under existing law. We now have an independent Bureau of Labor. This bill proposes to give it a subordinate and dependent place under a secretary of commerce. This measure as it is will not do full justice to the labor interests and is not in accord with the wishes of the millions of laboring people who constitute our great industrial army carrying forward the banner of progress in the march of civilization.

Life and Character of the Late Hon. Reese C. De Graffenreid.

OF
HON. RICHARD BARTHOLDT,
OF MISSOURI,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, January 25, 1903,

On the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That in pursuance of the special order heretofore adopted, that the House proceed to pay tribute to the memory of Hon. REESE C. DE GRAFFENREID, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Texas.

"Resolved, That, as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a faithful and distinguished public servant, the House at the conclusion of the memorial proceedings of this day shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk be, and is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased."

Mr. BARTHOLDT said:

Mr. SPEAKER: When on September 2 of last year the Congressional funeral party arrived with what was mortal of the late Hon. REESE C. DE GRAFFENREID at his beautiful little home town of Longview, in the State of Texas, they found upon every hand evidences and manifestations of the most genuine grief. All elements of the population showed a keen realization of the great loss they had sustained, and while their sorrow was mute, it was yet eloquent and conclusive proof of the enviable popularity and esteem which our departed friend had enjoyed among his own people.

To those of us who had come in close personal contact with him, this was no revelation. His loyalty to the cause of the people, their interests and concerns, great and small, was bound to beget popularity and to find a generous response. His personal characteristics, too, were such as to make him friends. There was no false in him. He was frank and openhearted, and the strong, manly instincts which moved and prompted him to fight with the courage of his convictions were mollified by the gentleness of a kind and sympathetic heart. Never did he pretend to be what in reality he was not, and all sham and hyprocrisy were repugnant to his nature.

He did not move among his fellowmen meekly and with upturned eyes, but he looked every one squarely in the face and gave him the hand shake of an honest man. He always stood his ground well, and in his national political associations he succeeded in a remarkably short time to surround himself with the nimbus of a strong personality and of typical American manhood.

One of his strong traits was gratitude to those who befriended him, and I have met no man who prized more highly the honor which his constituents had bestowed upon him or labored more diligently to deserve and prove himself worthy of it.

It was my privilege to speak a few words to the many mourners and friends who had assembled around the open casket at Longview, the last resting place of Mr. DE GRAFFENREID, and, with the permission of the House, I will in part repeat these remarks here:

In paying a last tribute to the memory of our departed friend, I do so in behalf of the Republican members of Congress whom on this sad occasion I am called upon to represent. He was your townsman and your Congressman; to the State and nation he was a faithful servant and an honest and able statesman; to me he was more; to me he was a dear personal friend. His geniality, his uprightness, his sterling character, and particularly his tolerance toward those who differed from him politically, had made him as popular on the Republican side of the House as he was among his own political friends; and if it is any consolation for you to know it, I will frankly say that among those who to-day are stricken with genuine grief on account of his untimely summons there are hundreds and thousands who, while belonging to another party, honored and loved him because he was a truly good man.

He came from that sturdy race which has done so much for the uplifting and the development of this mighty empire State of the South, and the characteristics of which distinguished him in public and private life.

"De," as we familiarly called him (had we loved him less we would have been less familiar), was always in the harness for his constituents. He never shirked a duty, and because of his conscientious zeal there was a feeling on the part of all to aid and support him in his purposes, which were always found to be honorable and for the best interests of those whom he so ably represented at Washington.

We mourn deeply with you and the State of Texas the great loss you have sustained by the death of one who has served his party and his country so well, and our sympathies go out to the dear ones he leaves behind him, and who, we hope and trust, will find consolation in the universal esteem in which he was held by all who knew him, and in the sweet memories of him which we shall preserve for evermore.

District of Columbia Appropriation Bill.

OF

HON. CHARLES F. COCHRAN,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 20, 1903.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 16842) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the Government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes—

Mr. COCHRAN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: At the last session of Congress I introduced a resolution calling on the Secretary of State for certain information concerning the removal of ancient monuments marking the true boundary of the American territory in Alaska which has been occupied and governed for more than five years by British military and civil officers. At that time the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee gave us to understand that negotiations were in progress looking to the settlement of what he misnamed the controversy concerning that boundary line.

In my judgment the controversy is over the forcible occupation of territory to which the British have no shadow of a claim and over which our sovereignty is as just and incontestable as it is over the Indian Territory or Oklahoma.

Like Venezuela, the Transvaal, and the Orange Free State, the United States has witnessed British occupation of a rich mining region, followed by a claim of title; but unlike those weak and defenseless countries, we have evinced no resentment of the outrage. It is in line with the traditional policy and conduct of the British Government, excepting only the fact that in general its depredations have been committed against countries too weak to defend themselves.

The discovery of the diamond mines in the Orange Free State, followed by the development of the Transvaal gold mines, sealed the doom of the South African Republics.

The discovery of gold mines in Venezuela would have sounded the death knell of Venezuelan independence had it not been for the intervention of the United States.

In the case of the South African diamond mines the unlawfulness of their appropriation was so flagrant that long after the commission of the crime the matter was taken up by British clergymen, and the enormity of the offense was made so manifest that a veritable storm of public indignation compelled the authorities to pay a paltry sum as pretended compensation for stolen property worth many millions.

The mournful story of the recent war in South Africa—a story replete with convincing proof that in the lexicon of this rapacious power there are no such words as honor, justice, or mercy—is found the bloody sequel. In the blackened ruins of desolated homes and the innumerable graves of the brave defenders of liberty and independence which dot the landscape from Spion Kop to Pretoria are the somber memorials of a crusade incited by cupidity and avarice, and waged with a relentlessness and ferocity seldom excelled by the savages of the jungles—a crusade entered upon with the deliberate purpose of establishing British sovereignty over the Transvaal gold mines.

The controversy over the Venezuelan gold mines is still fresh in the minds of Americans. The discovery of the mines was the signal for claim of sovereignty over a vast area to which theretofore Great Britain had made no claim. Geographers had concurred in describing this country as a part of Venezuela. The map makers, without exception, had included it within the boundaries of the republic. But when gold was discovered the British claim of ownership was brazenly asserted, and the little Republic was told that without parley or discussion this claim must be allowed. It was idle for Venezuela, in her weakness, to challenge the attention of Great Britain to the fact that for centuries the map makers had placed these lands within her borders. The freebooter nation was making ready to take the booty by force, and undoubtedly would have done so had not the United States intervened and compelled the arbitration of the controversy.

Mr. Chairman, who would have believed that this great Republic would ever tamely submit to a similar outrage? And yet I affirm that that is precisely what we have done. It had been said, and truthfully, that the victims of these numerous aggressions were too weak to defend their rights, and it had been believed that had they been capable of self-defense no effort would have been made to despoil them.

But Americans have lived to see Great Britain take possession of American gold fields and establish on American soil a British settlement. They have seen American prospectors and miners expelled from American soil by the aggression of British constabulary and have seen British speculators and promoters seize and acquire title to the richest placer gold mines in the world, and they have seen an American Secretary of State acquiesce in this palpable invasion of American territory, contenting himself with a stipulation that at some future time the two Governments will try to reach an amicable agreement in the premises. So the matter stands.

Mr. Chairman, I declare that by the arts of diplomacy—by twirling our Secretary of State about his finger as a child might a cat's tail—Lord Pauncefote has accomplished in Alaska precisely what British armies have accomplished in other parts of the world by menace and by force. He has reduced to British ownership a vast region in which are the richest gold mines in the world.

I hold in my hand a complete digest and history of the Alaskan boundary controversy, written and contributed to the Franklin Institute Journal by Thomas Willing Balch, a distinguished, capable, and conscientious investigator, student, and writer. No man can read it without coming to the conclusion that Great Britain never at any time between the date of the negotiation of her treaty with Russia fixing the boundary between Alaska and the British possessions and 1898 set up any claim of ownership of the disputed territory; that, on the contrary, the very territory now in dispute was held by Russia down to the time of our purchase of Alaska, and that we held it down to 1898 without intimation of a claim of title by Great Britain.

Furthermore, that during Russia's occupation of it the Hudson Bay Company, an English trading company, with the consent of the British Government, and the Russian Trading Company, with the consent of the Russian Government, entered into a contract by which a portion of the territory in dispute was leased to British traders by Russian traders, that the British paid a consideration, first in furs and other commodities, and later a cash consideration of $7,000 a year for the right of occupation of the territory to which they now claim title.

It only requires a casual investigation of public documents easily accessible to convince any investigator that there is no shadow of a foundation for the British claim to the territory she acquired by forcible invasion and holds by virtue of an agreement which is disgraceful to American diplomacy and a stigma upon national honor. Every line of the correspondence between Russia and England during the negotiation of the treaty fixing the boundary; the terms of the treaty itself; every map known to the world during seventy-five years that elapsed before the preposterous claim was advanced; the official charts of the British Admiralty; the geographies used in all the schools in Christendom, including the schools, colleges, and universities of Great Britain from 1828 until 1898—all these written and printed testimonials, coupled with Russian occupation until 1868, followed by American occupation until 1898, are arrayed against what—the forcible occupation of the country by the Canadian mounted police, and the naked and baseless claim of British ownership!

Mr. Chairman, as a full presentation of the case, I here present as part of my remarks, the whole case, the paper I have referred to. It quotes copiously from the diplomatic correspondence, and contains a concise history of the negotiations between Russia and Great Britain which resulted in fixing the boundary so unmistakably that there is no possible ground for dispute:

THE FRANKLIN INSTITUTE—ANNUAL MEETING HELD WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 15, 1902—THE ALASKO-CANADIAN FRONTIER.

[By Thomas Willing Balch.]

At the end of May, 1898, the United States and Great Britain agreed to appoint an Anglo-American Joint High Commission to consider and arrange upon a basis more favorable to both sides, such important problems as the regulations of the North Atlantic fisheries, commercial reciprocity, and the Bering Sea fishery question. Soon after, "for the first time a statement was presented by the British Government to the Government of the United States on the 1st of August, 1898, developing the fact that a difference of views existed respecting the provisions of the treaty of 1825" between the United States and the English Empire, concerning the meaning of the Alaskan frontier as defined in the Anglo-Russian treaty of 1825;[a] and on August 23 the British Government claimed that the eastern boundary of Alaska should run from the extremity of Prince of Wales Island at 54° 40′, along the estuary marked on recent maps as Pearse Canal, up to the top of the Portland Canal, from there straight to the coast and then along the mountains on the mainland nearest to the shore and across all the sinuosities of the sea that advance into the continent up to Mount St. Elias. ("The Alaskan boundary," by Hon. John W. Foster: The National Geographic Magazine, November, 1899, Washington, p. 455.)

By the treaty negotiated at St. Petersburg and signed there on February 16-28, 1825, the Muscovite and the British Empires agreed, in Articles III and IV of the treaty, upon the following divisional line between their respective North American possessions ("Fur-Seal Arbitration," Washington, Government Printing Office, 1895; Vol. IV, pp. 42-43):

"ARTICLE III.

"The line of demarcation between the possessions of the high contracting parties upon the coast of the continent and the islands of America to the northwest shall be drawn in the manner following:

"Commencing from the southernmost part of the island called Prince of Wales Island, which point lies in the parallel of 54° 40′ north latitude, and between the one hundred and thirty-first and one hundred and thirty-third degrees of west longitude (meridian of Greenwich), the said line shall ascend to the north along the channel called Portland Channel, as far as the point of the continent where it strikes the fifty-sixth degree of north latitude; from this last-mentioned point the line of demarcation shall follow the summit of the mountains situated parallel to the coast, as far as the point of intersection of the one hundred and forty-first degree of west longitude (of the same meridian); and finally from the said point of intersection the said meridian line of the one hundred and forty-first degree, in its prolongation as far as the Frozen Ocean, shall form the limit between the Russian and British possessions on the continent of America to the northwest.

"ARTICLE IV.

"With reference to the line of demarcation laid down in the preceding article, it is understood:

"First. That the island called Prince of Wales Island shall belong wholly to Russia.

"Second. That wherever the summit of the mountains, which extend in a direction parallel to the coast from the fifty-sixth degree of north latitude to the point of intersection of the one hundred and forty-first degree of west longitude, shall prove to be at a distance of more than 10 marine leagues from the ocean, the limit between the British possessions and the line of coast which is to belong to Russia, as above mentioned, shall be formed by a line parallel to the windings (sinuosities) of the coast, and which shall never exceed the distance of 10 marine leagues therefrom.[b]

"The negotiations that resulted in the treaty of 1825 were originated by an ukase promulgated in 1821 by Emperor Alexander I, in which, in addition to claiming exclusive jurisdiction for Russia in the waters of Bering Sea and a large part of the northern part of the Pacific Ocean, he extended also the territorial claims of Russia from the fifty-fifth degree, as claimed by the ukase of 1799, issued by the Emperor Paul, down to the twenty-first degree of north latitude. The United States and Great Britain both protested against the pretensions of sovereignty asserted in the ukase of 1821. In 1824 the United States and the Russian Governments signed a treaty in which, among other things, they agreed on the parallel of 54° 40′ as the divisional line between their respective territorial claims. All below that line Russia agreed to leave to the United States to contest with Great Britain, and all above it the United States consented to leave to Russia to dispute with England."

Meanwhile the course of negotiations between Russia and England did not progress as smoothly; but finally, in February, 1825, nearly a year after the signing of the Russo-American treaty, the Russian and the English plenipotentiaries signed the treaty containing the two articles above quoted. For more than half a century the British Empire never contested the interpretation openly placed by both the Muscovite and the United States Governments that under those two articles, first Russia and later—after the cession of Russian America or Alaska, in 1867, to the American Union—the United States were entitled to a strip of territory (lisière) on the mainland from the Portland Channel or canal in the south up to Mount St. Elias in the north, so as to cut off absolutely the British possessions from access to the sea above the point of 54° 40′. In August, 1898, for the first time, the British Empire formally claimed at the Quebec conference that the proper reading of those two articles entitled Canada to the upper part of most or all of the fiords between the Portland Canal and Mount St. Elias.

A review of the negotiations during the years 1822, 1823, 1824, and 1825, between Count Nesselrode and M. de Poletica in behalf of Russia, and first of Sir Charles Bagot and afterwards of Mr. Stratford Canning, later Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, for Great Britain, shows clearly that the agreement finally reached as embodied in the treaty of 1825 was to exclude the British North American territory from all access to the sea above the point of 54° 40′. From the very inception of the negotiations, the Russians insisted upon the possession for Russia of a strip or lisière on the mainland from the Portland Channel up to Mount St. Elias expressly to shut off England from acess to the sea at all points north of the Portland Canal.

Sir Charles Bagot, on behalf of England, fought strenuously to keep open a free access to the sea as far north above the line of 54° 40′ as possible. First he proposed that the line of territorial demarcation between the two countries should run "through Chatham Straits to the head of Lynn Canal, thence northwest to the one hundred and fortieth degree of longitude west to the Polar Sea." (Fur Seal Arbitration, Vol. IV, p. 424.) To this Count Nesselrode and M. de Poletica replied with a contre-projet in which they proposed that the frontier line, beginning at the southern end of Prince of Wales Island, should ascend the Portland Canal up to the mountains; that then from that point it should follow the mountains parallel to the sinuosities of the coast up to the one hundred and thirty-ninth degree of longitude west from Greenwich, and then follow that degree of longitude to the north. (Fur Seal Arbitration, Vol. IV, p. 427.)

At the next conference Sir Charles Bagot gave Count Nesselrode and M. de Poletica a written modification of his first proposition. In this new proposal he first stated that the frontier that they demanded would deprive Great Britain of sovereignty over all the anses and small bays that lie between 56° and 54° 40′ of latitude, and that owing to the proximity of these fiords and estuaries to the interior posts of the Hudson Bay Company they would be of essential importance to the commerce of that company; while on the other hand, the Russian-American Company had posts neither on the mainland between those degrees of latitude nor even on the neighboring islands. Sir Charles proposed that the line of separation should pass through "the middle of the canal that separates Prince of Wales Island and Duke of York Island from all the islands situated to the north of the said islands until it (the line) touches the mainland." Then advancing in the same direction to the east for 10 marine leagues, the line should then ascend toward the north and northwest, at a distance of 10 marine leagues from the shore, following the sinuosities of the coast up to the one hundred and fortieth degree of longitude west from Greenwich and then up to the north. (Fur Seal Arbitration, Vol. IV, p. 428.)

At the next conference the Russian plenipotentiaries again insisted upon their original proposal that the frontier line should ascend the Portland Canal and then follow the mountains bordering the coast line.

Sir Charles Bagot then brought forward a third boundary line, that, passing up Duke of Clarence Sound and then running from west to east along the straits separating Prince of Wales Island and Duke of York Island to the north, should then advance to the north and the northwest in the way already proposed. (Fur-Seal Arbitration, Vol. IV, p. 430.)

But again the Russian diplomats insisted on their original proposition. On April 17, 1824, Count Nesselrode addressed to Count Lieven, the Russian ambassador at London, a long and exhaustive review of the negotiations with Sir Charles Bagot, and instructed Count Lieven to press the Russian views upon the English cabinet. In that communication, after speaking of Russia's declaration at the beginning of the negotiations that she would not insist upon the claim to the territory down to the fifty-first degree, put forward in the ukase of 1821, and that she would be content to maintain the limits assigned to Russian America by the ukase of 1799, he went on to say "that consequently the line of the fifty-fifth degree of north latitude would constitute upon the south the frontier of the States of His Imperial Majesty, that upon the continent and toward the east this frontier could run along the mountains that follow the sinuosities of the coast up to Mount St. Elias, and that from that point up to the Arctic Ocean we would fix the limits of the respective possessions according to the line of the one hundred and fortieth degree of longitude west from Greenwich.

"In order not to cut Prince of Wales Island, which according to this arrangement should belong to Russia, we proposed to carry the southern frontier of our domains to 54° 40′ of latitude and to make it reach the coast of the continent at the Portland Canal, whose mouth opening on the ocean is at the height of Prince of Wales Island and whose origin is in the lands between the fifty-fifth degree and fifty-sixth degree of latitude."

Russia, by limiting her demands to those set forth in the ukase of 1799, simply defended claims against which for over twenty years neither England nor any other power had ever made a protest. England, on the contrary, sought to establish her right to territory which she had thus passively recognized as Russian and which lay beyond any of her settlements. Count Nesselrode contrasted the policy of the two States in a pithy sentence: "Thus we wish to retain and the British companies wish to acquire."

The negotiators were thus brought face to face with their rival claims. The Russians insisted, on the one hand, that they must have possession of a lisière or strip of territory on the mainland in order to support the Russian establishments on the islands and to prevent the Hudson Bay Company from having access to the sea and forming posts and settlements upon the coast line opposite to the Russian islands, while Sir Charles Bagot maintained, on the other hand, that Great Britain must have such part of the coast and inlets north of 54° 40′ as would enable the English companies and the settlements back from the coast to have free access to the fiords and estuaries opening into the ocean.

After a few months Mr. George Canning, the English foreign secretary, instructed Sir Charles Bagot to agree to the Portland Channel as part of the frontier line; but with the reservation, first, that the eastern line of demarcation should be so defined as to guard against any possibility, owing to subsequent geographical discoveries, that it could be drawn at a greater distance from the coast than 10 marine leagues, and, secondly, that the harbor of Novo-Archangelsk (now Sitka) and the rivers and creeks on the continent should remain open forever to British commerce.

During the course of the new negotiations between Count Nesselrode and M. de Poletica in behalf of Russia and of Sir Charles Bagot for England the second of these two points was the main object of discussion. Sir Charles was unable to conclude a treaty with the Russian diplomats, for the latter refused to agree to open forever the port of Novo-Archangelsk to British commerce. Neither were they willing to grant to the subjects of England the right forever to navigate and trade along the coast of the lisière that it was proposed Russia should have. The British ambassador, realizing that it was impossible for him to negotiate a treaty in accordance with his instructions, soon thereafter left St. Petersburg.

In the latter part of the year 1824 Great Britain appointed Mr. Stratford Canning, later Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, one of the ablest of her diplomats, to continue the negotiations left unfinished between Sir Charles Bagot and Count Nesselrode and M. de Poletica. When Canning took up the negotiations Great Britain had receded from all contentions except as to the width of the lisière. In his instructions he received power to arrange for a line of demarcation that should run along the crest of the mountains, except where the mountains were more than 10 marine leagues from the shore, in which case the frontier should follow at a distance of 10 marine leagues inland the sinuosities of the shore. With these new instructions Stratford Canning was able to conclude a treaty to which Sir Charles Bagot could not have agreed, and on February 16 to 28, 1825, Stratford Canning, on behalf of Great Britain, and Count Nesselrode and M. de Poletica, for Russia, signed a treaty definitely dividing Canada and Russian America.

George Canning, toward the end of his instructions to Stratford Canning, showed what was the chief motive of England in the pending negotiations with Russia. He wrote:

"It remains only in recapitulation to remind you of the origin and principles of this whole negotiation.

"It is not on our part essentially a negotiation about limits.

"It is a demand of the repeal of an offensive and unjustifiable arrogation of exclusive jurisdiction over an ocean of unmeasured extent, but a demand qualified and mitigated in its manner in order that its justice may be acknowledged and satisfied without soreness or humiliation on the part of Russia.

"We negotiate about territory to cover the remonstrance upon principle.

"But any attempt to take undue advantage of this voluntary facility we must oppose." (Fur Seal Arbitration, Vol. IV, p. 448.)

Thus the chief reason of the English Government was to obtain from that of Russia an official disclaimer of the assertion in the ukase of 1821 that the waters of Bering Sea and parts of the northern Pacific were exclusively Russian waters. Russia would not assent to formally recognize the right of English ships freely to navigate those seas unless the boundary question was also arranged and settled so as to insure to Russia an unbroken lisière from the Portland Canal up to Mount St. Elias. And on this last point England, after a long and stubborn resistance, finally yielded.

[b] Owing to the importance of the French text, which the British Government in its printed argument in the Bering Sea seal fisheries case (Fur Seal Arbitration, Vol. IV, p. 500) recognized as the official version, and the fact that French is the diplomatic language of the world, which was probably much more the case in 1825 than to-day, the French text is given.

Much of the trouble that the negotiators of the Anglo-Muscovite treaty of 1825 had in agreeing upon the eastern boundary of the lisière was due to a lack of knowledge respecting the mountains along the northwest American coast. According to Vancouver's chart and other available information a mountain range ran along the coast not far from the sea. When Stratford Canning and Count Nesselrode and M. de Poletica finally agreed upon the mountain divide as the frontier between the two nations, Canning, acting upon instructions from his cousin, George Canning, who was British secretary of foreign affairs, insisted that should the summit of the mountains prove to be at any point more than 10 marine leagues from the shore, then the line of demarcation should be drawn parallel to the sinuosities of the shore at a distance of 10 marine leagues. This 10-league limit to the eastward was inserted on purpose, as George Canning stated in his instructions to Stratford Canning, to guard England against a possibility of having her territory pushed back to the eastward a hundred miles or more from the sea in case the crest of the mountains was found in reality to lie far back from the cost instead of close to it, as was then supposed.

Thus a review of the negotiations that culminated in the Anglo-Muscovite treaty of 1825 shows clearly that the negotiators of that treaty intended to include within the Russian territory a lisière on the mainland, stretching from the Portland Canal in the south up to Mount St. Elias in the north, and extending between those points far enough inland to exclude the English possessions absolutely from access to the coast line above 54° 40′.

The treaty was drawn in French, and an English copy was also prepared. In the French version, the language of diplomacy (Fur-Seal Arbitration, Vol. IV, p. 500 et seq. Principes du Droit des Gens, par Alphonse Rivier: Paris, 1896, vol. 11, p. 19. Introduction to the Study of International Law, by Theodore D. Woolsey; New York, 1888, fifth edition, p. 270), it is said that the inland frontier of the lisière shall be a line drawn "parallèle aux sinuosités ('windings' in the English version) de la côte."

The meaning of the phrase is made absolutely clear by the use of the word "sinuosités." Littré, who was a member of l'Académie Française, defines, in his Dictionnaire de la Langue Française, "sinuosités" as meaning: "Qualité de ce qui est sinueus. Cette rivière fait beaucoup de sinuosités. 'Il allait dans aumes de Danemark et de Suède, pour mesurer toutes les sinuosités.' Font. Czar Pierre. 'Les Jeunes Déliens se mêlérent avec eux (les Athéniens) pour figurer les sinuosités du labyrinthe de Crète.' Barthél. Anach., ch. 76." (Littré, Paris, Hachette et Cie., 1873.) Webster defines sinuosity to mean: "1. The quality of being sinuous, or bending in and out. 2. A series of bends and turns in arches or other irregular figures; a series of windings. 'A line of coast certainly amounting with its sinuosities to more than 700 miles.' S. Smith." (An American Dictionary of the English Language, revised by Professors Goodrich and Porter, of Yale; Springfield, Mass., 1876.)

Thus the use of the word "sinuosités," independently of all other evidence, shows that the negotiators of the treaty meant to include within the Russian lisière the whole of the Lynn Canal and all other fiords above the Portland Canal.

Aside, however, from the manifest intent of the negotiators as thus revealed, the meaning and understanding of both the British and the Russians as to the definite frontier for which they arranged between their respective Empires in the treaty of 1825 is conclusively proved, first, by the overwhelming multitude of maps of the best cartographers of the various leading powers of the world, including those of England and Canada, in sustaining the boundary always claimed in the beginning by Russia and afterwards by the United States; secondly, by the acts of the British and the Canadian authorities until well toward the close of the nineteenth century.

In the year 1825, shortly after the treaty defining the frontier between Russian and British North America became known, A. Brué, one of the leading French cartographers, published at Paris a map entitled "Carte de l'Amérique Septentrionale: Redigée par A. Brué, Géographe du Roi; Atlas Universal, Pl. 38." On this map Brué drew the boundary of Russian America on the continent, from the top of the Portland Canal at the distance of 10 marine leagues from tide water round all the sinuosities up to the one hundred and forty-first degree of longitude, and then along that meridian to the north. Two years later, in 1827, the celebrated Russian admiral and navigator, A. J. de Krusenstern, published at St. Petersburg, "par ordre de Sa Majesté Impériale," a "Carte Générale de l'Ocean Pacifique, Hemisphère Boréal." Krusenstern drew on the mainland the frontier of Russian America from the top of the Portland Canal round the sinuosities of the shore at a distance of 10 marine leagues from tide water up to the one hundred and forty-first degree, and then northward along that meridian.

Along the line of the one hundred and forty-first degree is inscribed, "Limites des possessions Russes et Anglaises d'aprés le Traité de 1825." Two years later, in 1829, there appeared at St. Petersburg a map of the eastern extremity of Siberia and the northwest coast of America. This map was "No. 58° (b)" of the "Atlas Géographique de l'Empire de Russie," etc., that was prepared by Functionary Piadischeff. On this map Piadischeff drew the Russo-British frontier from Mount St. Elias down to the top of the Portland Canal, and then along that sinuosity down to the sea at 54° 40′, thereby shutting off Britain from access to the sea above 54° 40′.

The British Government made no protest against the way Krusenstern and Piadischeff had marked the boundary. On the contrary, a few years later, in 1831, a map was prepared by Joseph Bouchette, jr., "deputy surveyor-general of the Province of Lower Canada," and published the same year at London by James Wyld, geographer to the King, and "with His Majesty's most gracious and special permission, No. 1 most humbly and gratefully dedicated * * * to His Most Excellent Majesty King William IV * * * compiled from the latest and most approved astronomical observations, authorities, and recent surveys." It reaffirmed the boundary as given upon Krusenstern's imperial map. Again, in a Narrative of a Journey Round the World During the Years 1841 and 1842, by Sir George Simpson, Governor-in-Chief of the Hudson's Bay Company's Territories in North America, published at London in 1847 (London: Henry Colburn, 1847; there is a copy of this work in the British Museum), a map in volume 1, showing the author's route, gives the line of demarcation between the Russian and the English territories as it was laid down by Krusenstern in his map of 1827.

Ten years later, in 1857, an investigation into the affairs of the Hudson Bay Company was held by a special committee of the House of Commons. At that investigation Sir George Simpson, who was examined, presented a map of the territory in question, and, speaking for the company, said: "There is a margin of coast, marked yellow on the map from 54° 40′ up to Cross Sound, which we have rented from the Russian Company." This map shows that the strip of land on the continent extended far enough inland to include all the sinuosities of the coast so as to exclude, according to the United States claims, the British territory altogether from any outlet upon salt water above 54° 40′.

Again in 1867, about the time of the sale by Russia to the United States of Russian America, to which William H. Seward gave the name of Alaska (Seward at Washington as Senator and Secretary of State, by Frederick W. Seward. New York: 1891, Vol. III, p. 369. Concerning the sale of Alaska by Russia to the United States, see Speech of Hon. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, on the Cession of Russian America to the United States, 1867, passim, and The Alabama Arbitration, by Thomas Willing Balch. Philadelphia: 1900, pp. 24–38), Black's General Atlas of the World was published at Edinburgh. In the introduction of this work the following description of Russian America is given:

"Russian America comprehends the northwestern portion of the continent, with the adjacent islands, extending from Bering Strait east to the meridian of Mount St. Elias (about 141° W.), and from that mountain southward along the maritime chain of hills till it touches the coast about 54° 40′."

Then on three maps of this atlas, "The World," No. 2, "The World on Mercator's Projection," No. 3, and "North America," No. 39, the Russian territory from Mount St. Elias down to the end of the Portland Canal at 54° 40′ is marked so as to include within the Muscovite possessions all fiords and estuaries along the coast, and thus cutting off the British territory entirely from all access to tide water above 54° 40′. In addition there is given a small map marked at the top "Supplementary sketch map, Black's General Atlas, for plate 41," and at the bottom, "United States after Cession of Russian American, April, 1867, coloured blue." On this sketch map the territory purchased by the United States is marked "Formerly Russian America," and, like the rest of the United States, it is colored blue. And the boundary of the new territory of Alaska is given as upon the other three maps of this atlas, Nos. 2, 3, and 39, already cited, according to Brue's map of 1825, and Krusenstern's map of 1827, and the Canadian and the English maps already referred to, and in accordance with the territorial claim that Russia and the United States have always maintained and acted upon.

Many other maps can be mentioned, in addition to those above quoted, against Britain's recent claim. For examples, Petermann's map in the Mittheilungen of April, 1869; Thomas Devine's map, prepared and printed in 1877 at Toronto by order of the Canadian government; Alexander Keith Johnston's map of "North America," in his "Handy Royal Atlas of Modern Geography," published at Edinburgh and London in 1881; E. Andriveau-Goujon's map of "l'Amérique du Nord," published at Paris in 1887; and, finally, the wall map (1897) of the "United States," by Edward Stanford ("The United States." London: Published by Edward Stanford, 26 and 27 Cockspur street, Charing Cross, S. W., July 15, 1897), an important map maker of London to-day, give to Alaska the limits always claimed since 1825 by Russia and the United States.

Some maps—for example, "The World," by James Gardner, published in 1825 and dedicated "To His Most Gracious Majesty George IV;" "Nord America, Entworfen andgezeichenet von C. F. Weiland," 1826 and a "Carte Physique et Politique par A. H. Brué," 1827—bring the Russian boundary on the mainland from Mount St. Elias down only to a point about halfway opposite Prince of Wales Island at about 56°, and then along the estuaries, so as to include all of Prince of Wales Island in the Russian territory, instead of carrying the frontier to the top of the Portland Canal and then down to the sea at about 54° 40′. But for all the territory above the point on the continent about halfway opposite Prince of Wales Island up to the 141° west from Greenwich, these maps give the divisional line between the Muscovite and the British territories far enough inland and around the sinuosities of the coast so as to cut off the British territory from all contact with tide water.

Besides, Weiland, in a map of 1843, corrected his error in his map of 1826 in stopping a little short of the Portland Canal in marking the Russo-Canadian boundary; and in Bruce's maps of 1833 and 1839 the divisional line is given as it was marked on his map of 1825. Gardner's map is overwhelmed by the multitude of English and Canadian maps—governmental and private—that followed Krusenstern's delineation of the line of demarcation. And additional proof of how far south the negotiators of the treaty of 1825 intended that the Russian lisière should extend when they used the phrase, "la dite ligne remontera au nord le long de la passe dite Portland Channel, jusqu'au point de la terre ferme ou elle atteint le 56 degré de latitude nord," is clearly shown by Vancouver's chart, upon which he inscribed the name of "Portland Canal." ("A chart showing part of the coast of northwest America with the tracks of His Majesty's sloop Discovery and armed tender Chatham, commanded by George Vancouver.")

Probably the most important English map as showing what the best geographers of the British Government thought, until very recently, was the true boundary, is the British "Admiralty Chart No. 787," giving the northwest coast of America from "Cape Corrientes, Mexico, to Kadiak Island," prepared in 1876, by F. J. Evans, R. N., published in 1877, and corrected up to April, 1898. On this chart of the British Admiralty, the frontier of the United States descends the 141° of longitude west from Greenwich, and then advancing on the continent but passing round the sinuosities of the coast so as to give a continuous lisière of territory cutting off the Dominion of Canada from all contact with any of the fiords or sinuosities that bulge into the continent between Mount St. Elias and the Portland Canal, the frontier is drawn to the head of the Portland Canal in about 56°, and then down that sinuosity, striking Dixons entrance at 54° 40′. Thus the British Admiralty itself upholds the territorial claims held and maintained by both the Russian and the United States Governments. ("I bought the copy of this chart, from which map Plate VIII is reproduced, at Edward Stanford's 26 and 27 Cockspur street, Charing Cross, S. W., London, in September, 1901, showing that up to that date, at least, the British Admiralty agreed with the United States as to the frontier.")

The English and the Canadian governments, through their official representatives, have again and again recognized the claim of Russia down to 1867, and since then that of the United States, that the area of Russian America, or Alaska, comprises an unbroken strip of territory on the continent, extending from Mount St. Elias in the north to the Portland Canal in the south; that this strip of land encircles all the sinuosities of the shore, and that by this strip the Dominion of Canada is cut off from all contact with the indentations of the sea along the northwest coast of the continent between the Portland Canal at about 54° 40′ north latitude and Mount St. Elias. From these numerous official acts a few are presented here.

In 1857 "a select committee" of the House of Commons of the British Parliament was appointed "to consider the state of those British possessions in North America which are under the administration of the Hudson Bay Company, or over which they possess a license to trade."[a] The committee consisted of 19 members in all, among whom were Mr. Secretary Labouchere (chairman), Lord John Russell, Lord Stanley, Mr. Edward Ellice (a native of Canada and a director of the Hudson Bay Company), Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Roebuck, and Sir John Pakington. The committee examined, among others, Sir George Simpson, who for thirty-seven years was the governor of Second session, 1857. Veneris, 8° die maii, 1857:

Ordered, That a select committee be appointed "to consider the state of those British possessions in North America which are under the administration of the Hudson Bay Company, or over which they possess a license to trade." (P. 11.)

the territories of the Hudson Bay Company. Part of Sir George Simpson's testimony was as follows:

"1026. Besides your own territory, I think you administer a portion of the territory which belongs to Russia under some arrangement with the Russian Company?—There is a margin of coast marked yellow in the map from 54° 40′ up to Cross Sound which we have rented from the Russian-American Company for a term of years.

"1027. Is that the whole of that strip?—The strip goes to Mount St. Elias.

"1028. Where does it begin?—Near Fort Simpson, in latitude 54°; it runs up to Mount St. Elias, which is farther north.

"1029. Is it the whole of that strip which is included between the British territory and the sea?—We have only rented the part between Fort Simpson and Cross Sound.

"1030. What is the date of that arrangement?—That arrangement, I think, was entered into about 1839.

"1031. What are the terms upon which it was made; do you pay a rent for that land?—The British territory runs along inland from the coast about 30 miles; the Russian territory runs along the coast; we have the right of navigation through the rivers to hunt the interior country. A misunderstanding existed upon that point in the first instance; we were about to establish a post upon one of the rivers, which led to very serious difficulties between the Russian-American Company and ourselves; we had a long correspondence, and to guard against the recurrence of these difficulties it was agreed that we should lease this margin of coast, and pay them a rent; the rent, in the first instance, in otters; I think we gave 2,000 otters a year; it is now converted into money; we give, I think, £1,500 a year."

It will be observed from the foregoing questions and the replies of Sir George Simpson that the Hudson Bay Company in 1839 recognized by an official act, to wit, a lease of Russian territory, that Russia had a lisière on the continent from Mount St. Elias almost down to Fort Simpson, and that owing to this strip of land the British territory was pushed back about 30 miles "inland from the coast." In addition, it will be noted that Sir George Simpson, in describing the positions and extent of the land rented by his company from the Russian company, referred to a map that he showed the committee and upon which the lisière belonging to Russia was marked so as to include the sinuosities of the coast, the Lynn Canal, and all the other fiords above 54° 40′ entirely, and so cutting off the English territory absolutely from all contact with tide water.

Subsequently, in the course of Sir George Simpson's examination, the question of the lease of 1839 by the Hudson Bay Company of the Russian lisière again came up, and the following questions and answers were asked and given:

"1732. CHAIRMAN. I think you made an arrangement with the Russian Company by which you hold, under a lease, a portion of their territory?—Yes.

"1733. I believe that arrangement is that you hold that strip of country which intervenes between your territory and the sea, and that you give them £1,500 a year for it?—Yes.

"1734. What were your objects in making that arrangement?—To prevent difficulties existing between the Russians and ourselves—as a peace offering.

"1735. What was the nature of those difficulties?—We were desirous of passing through their territory, which is inland from the coast about 30 miles. There is a margin of 30 miles of coast belonging to the Russians. We had the right of navigating the rivers falling into the ocean, and of settling the interior country. Difficulties arose between us in regard to the trade of the country, and to remove all those difficulties we agreed to give them an annual allowance. I think, in the first instance, 2,000 otter skins, and afterwards £1,500 a year.

* * * * * * *

"1738. During the late war (the Crimean) which existed between Russia and England, I believe that some arrangement was made between you and the Russians by which you agreed not to molest one another?—Yes; such an arrangement was made.

"1739. By the two companies?—Yes; and Government confirmed the arrangement.

"1740. You agreed that on neither side should there be any molestation or interference with the trade of the different parties?—Yes.

"1741. And I believe that that was strictly observed during the whole war?—Yes.

"1742. Mr. BELL. Which Government confirmed the arrangement, the Russian or the English, or both?—Both Governments."

This additional information shows that the English company rented the lisière from the Russian company because the lisière shut off the English company from access to the fiords of the sea that advanced into the continent. And further, these questions and replies prove that the English Government by confirming the agreement of the English company with the Russian not to interfere with each other while their respective Governments were busy waging war in other parts of the world during the years 1854, 1855, and 1856, recognized and sanctioned the claim of Russia that she had an unbroken lisière on the mainland extending far enough inland so as to envelop within her own domains the Lynn Canal and all the fiords that penetrate into the continent above the Portland Canal.

Some twenty years after the investigation by the House of Commons into the affairs of the Hudson Bay Company, the Canadian government, through the intermediary of the British foreign office, formally recognized that the lisière of Alaska shut off Canadian territory from access to the sea.

It was in 1876, while taking a prisoner named Peter Martin, who was condemned in the Cassiar district of British Columbia for some act committed in Canadian territory, from the place where he was convicted to the place where he was to be imprisoned, that Canadian constables crossed with the prisoner the United States territory lying along the Stickine River. They encamped with Martin at a point some 13 miles up the river from its mouth. There Martin attempted unsuccessfully to escape, and made an assault on an officer. Upon his arrival at Victoria, the capital of British Columbia he was tried and convicted for his attempted escape and attack upon the constable, and the court sentenced him.

The Secretary of State, Hamilton Fish, protested against this infringement of the territorial sovereignty of the United States in the Territory of Alaska. In a letter to Sir Edward Thornton, the English minister at Washington, he said:

"I have the honor, therefore, to ask again your attention to the subject and to remark that if, as appears admittedly to be the fact, the colonial officers in transporting Martin from the place at which he was convicted to his place of imprisonment, via the Stickine River, did conduct him within and through what is the unquestioned territory of the United States, a violation of the sovereignty of the United States has been committed, and the recapture and removal of the prisoner from the jurisdiction of the United States to British soil is an illegal act, violent and forcible act, which can not justify the subsequent proceedings whereby he has been, is, or may be restricted of his liberty."

The transit of the constables with their prisoner, Martin, through American territory was not due to a mistake on their part as to the extent of Canadian territory, for J. B. Lovell, a Canadian justice of the peace in the Cassiar district of British Columbia, wrote to Captain Jocelyn, in command at Fort Wrangel, saying:

"The absence of any jail here (Glenora, Cassiar), or secure place of imprisonment, necessitates sending him through as soon as possible, and I hope you will excuse the liberty we take in forwarding him through United States territory without special permission."

After an investigation into the facts of the case, the Dominion government acknowledged the justness of Secretary Fish's protest by "setting Peter Martin at liberty without further delay," and thus recognized that the Canadian constables who had Martin in their charge when they encamped on the Stikine, 13 miles up from the mouth of the river, were on the United States soil, and so that Canada's jurisdiction in that region did not extend to tide water. (Papers relating to the Foreign Relations of the United States. Washington: Government Printing Office, 1877, pp. 266, 267, 271.)

Another recognition by the British Empire that the lisière restricted Canadian sovereignty from contact with the sea occurred shortly after the case of Peter Martin.

Owing to a clash between the United States and the Canadian customs officials as to the extent of their respective jurisdiction on the Stikine River, their two Governments agreed in 1878 upon a provisional boundary line across that river. The Canadian government had sent in March, 1877, one of the engineer officers, Joseph Hunter, "to execute," in the language of Sir Edward Thornton to Secretary Evarts, "a survey of a portion of the Stikine River for the purpose of defining the boundary line where it crosses that river between the Dominion of Canada and the Territory of Alaska."

This Canadian engineer, Hunter, after measuring from Rothsay Point, at the mouth of the Stickine River, a distance 10 marine leagues inland, determined—in the light of Articles III and IV of the Anglo-Russian treaty of February 16-28, 1825, which two articles he was instructed expressly "by direction of the minister of the interior" to consider in locating the boundary—that the frontier crossed the Stickine at a point about 25 miles up the river and about 20 miles in a straight line from the coast.

Without considering whether, owing to the break in the watershed caused by the passage of the Stickine through the mountains, the United States territory extends inland to the full extent of 30 miles, Hunter decided that the line should cross the river at a point 20 miles back from the coast, but still far enough back from the mouth of the river to shut off Canadian territory from contact in that district with the sea. He came to this decision, because he found that at that point a range of mountains parallel to the coast crossed the Stickine River, and, as he stated expressly in his report to his chief, he acted upon the theory that this mountain range followed the shore line within the meaning of the treaty of 1825 as he understood it. In his report to his Government he said:

"Having identified Rothsay Point on the coast at the delta of the Stickine River, a monument was erected thereon, from which the survey of the river was commenced, and from which was estimated the 10 marine leagues referred to in the convention.

"The Canadian Government sent a copy of this report, together with a map explaining it, through the British foreign office to Sir Edward Thornton at Washington, who communicated it to Secretary William M. Evarts, with the purpose of obtaining his acceptance of this boundary. Mr. Evarts agreed to accept it as a provisional line, but with the reservation that it should not in any way prejudice the rights of the two Governments whenever a joint survey was made to determine the frontier. By this voluntary proposal of a provisional boundary across the Stickine River, the British and the Canadian Governments showed that in 1877 and 1878 they considered that Canadian territory above the point of 54° 40′ was restricted by the meaning of Articles III and IV of the Anglo-Muscovite Treaty of 1825 from access to the sea." ("Papers relating to the foreign relations of the United States." Washington, Government Printing Office, 1878, p. 339.)

The forgoing review of the negotiations that resulted in the treaty of 1825 and the subsequent acts of the nations concerned in the Alaska-Canadian frontier, shows clearly that from the very inception of the negotiations Russia insisted upon the absolute possession of a continuous, unbroken lisière on the continent down to the Portland Channel for the openly expressed purpose of shutting out England from access to the sea above 54° 40′, and that England finally yielded the point.

During Polk's Administration (1845-49), when the United States and Great Britain advanced conflicting claims to the territory lying between the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific Ocean, now known as British Columbia, and the supporters of Polk took up the cry of "Fifty-four forty or fight," Russia offered her American possessions to the United States if they would maintain their claim to the territory west of the Rockies up to 54° 40′, the most southern point of Russian-America, thereby shutting out Britain entirely from access to the Pacific Ocean. ("Papers relating to foreign affairs, accompanying the annual message of the President to the second session of the Fortieth Congress," 1867, Part 1. Washington, Government Printing Office, 1868, p. 390.)

But owing to the jealousy of the slave power our Government yielded all the country west of the Rockies and above the forty-ninth degree of north latitude, and thus permitted the British Empire to obtain an outlet on the Pacific. Not content with this successful territorial extension, the British Empire, after having allowed, without a protest for almost three-quarters of a century, the inclusion by the Muscovite and the United States Government within their sovereignty—as is shown both by the maps and other official acts of these two nations—of all the sinuosities or fiords along the coast of the mainland above 54° 40′, the British Empire now lays claim, since the discovery of gold in the Klondike, to a large and to us most important part of our Alaskan domain. The American and British contentions to-day are well expressed by the pithy sentence in which Count Nesselrode over seventy-five years ago contrasted the efforts of Russia and England when they were seeking to agree upon a frontier between their American possessions: "Ainsi nous voulons conserver, et les compagnies Angloises veulent acquerir." (Thus we wish to retain, and the English companies wish to acquire.)

Canada wishes, and she has the support of England, to have her claim—that she is entitled to many outlets upon tide water above 54° 40′—submitted to the arbitration of third parties.

(A letter by the writer, entitled "Canada and Alaska," briefly touching on the boundary question, was printed in the New York Nation January 2, 1902, and the New York Evening Post January 4. Another letter, also under the same title, written by a gentleman at Ottawa, appeared in the same papers January 16 and 18, respectively. Still another letter under the title of "Facts about the Alaskan boundary," was published in the Nation of January 23 and the Evening Post of January 27. This last communication was written by a gentleman in California, evidently a Canadian. The Hon. William H. Dall, of Washington, D. C., followed with a strong letter, "The Alaskan boundary," in the Nation January 30 and the Evening Post of February 1. Then another communication by the writer, "Canada and Alaska," was given a place in the Nation February 6 and the Evening Post February 7.)

The United States should never consent to any such arrangement. If such a plan were adopted and a decision were given altogether against Canada, she would be no worse off than she has been from 1825 to the present day, while anything decided in her favor would be a clear gain to her. This country, on the contrary, can not by any possibility gain more than she now has, viz, that which she purchased from Russia in 1867, and to all of whose rights she succeeded. At the same time the United States can lose heavily, for the inclusion in Canadian territory of only one port, like Pyramid Harbor or Dyea, on the Lynn Canal, would greatly lessen for the United States the present and future value of the Alaskan lisière.

The evidence in the case is overwhelmingly on the side of the United States and shows that they are entitled by long, uninterrupted occupancy and other rights to an unbroken strip of land on the continent from Mount St. Elias down to the Portland Channel. There is no more reason for the United States to allow their right to the possession of this unbroken Alaskan lisière to be referred to the decision of foreign judges than would be the case if the British Empire advanced a claim to sovereignty over the coast of Georgia or the port of Baltimore and proposed that this demand should be referred to the judgment of subjects of third powers. For if the claim of Canada to Alaskan territory is referred to foreigners for settlement, the United States can gain nothing while they will incur the risk of losing territory over which the right of sovereignty of Russia and then of the United States runs back unchallenged for more than half a century.

If France advanced a claim to the Isle of Wight and then asked England to refer her title to the island to the arbitration of foreigners, would Great Britain consent? And for the English Empire to advance a demand to many outlets upon tide water on the northwest coast of America above 54° 40′ and then ask the United States to submit this claim to the arbitration of the citizens of third powers is a similar case. Whether the frontier should pass over a certain mountain top or through a given gorge is a proper subject for settlement by a mutual survey. But by no possibility has Canada any right to territory touching tide water above 54° 40′. The United States should never consent to refer such a proposition to arbitration.

Mr. Chairman, I can add nothing to this document. It tells the whole story. It is drawn from official sources and is incontrovertible. It shows that seventy-five years ago Great Britain explicitly relinquished any pretense of ownership of the country she has deliberately invaded, and has ever since acquiesced in the possession of it, first by Russia and later by the United States.

Concerning the great value of the gold mines situate in the region of which we have thus been despoiled, the American people are well informed, and if heretofore they have entertained a doubt of American ownership, a glance at the admitted facts here set forth will remove it.

Mr. Chairman, the origin of the preposterous and insolent claim to these gold fields is not obscure. It was trumped up by English and Canadians speculators and adventurers, just as the claim to the African diamond mines and the conspiracy against the liberty of the Boers were invented by Cecil Rhodes and his coparceners. The originators of the claim had forcibly invaded and occupied the country long before the claim of ownership was advanced. Having seized the country, they desired to reduce all that is worth anything within its boundaries to private ownership. With this in view, Lord Pauncefote, the British minister, entered into negotiations with his very good friend, the Secretary of State. The result was a foregone conclusion.

Our State Department acquiesced in the suggestion that Great Britain should hold the conquered country pending a settlement. Sir, I use the word "conquered" advisedly. When we bought Alaska, the Russians, then in possession of this country, handed it over to us. We retained possession until 1897. Then the Canadian mounted police, an armed force, took forcible possession, expelled American prospectors and miners and American property owners from it, and later established the civil jurisdiction of the Canadian government.

If this was not an invasion, what was it? If it was an invasion and resulted in occupation of the country, the expulsion of the sovereignty claiming it, and the establishment of the sovereignty of the invader, what was it, if not a conquest?

Were these facts known to the Secretary of State when he consented that pending negotiations, by which somewhere in the distant future, somehow, this controversy as to this boundary line should be settled, the British might retain possession? If he did not know them, such ignorance on the part of the chief Cabinet officer of the Republic is to be deplored. It he did know them, it was the most cowardly, the most contemptible. and most pusilanimous surrender of national rights ever witnessed in the history of the diplomatic negotiations of a great country.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman has characterized this conduct in very severe terms.

Mr. COCHRAN. I have, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. How does he think that compares in enormity with the surrender of all of the territory between the forty-ninth parallel and 54° 40′?

Mr. COCHRAN. I will answer that. The gentleman——

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman will remember——

Mr. COCHRAN. Just a moment. I want to answer your question. I do not want the gentleman to make a speech. That controversy, like this one, was with the British Government. It occurred when our weakness as a military and financial power made our public men and the people hesitate to go to war if such a misfortune could be honorably avoided. Yet I do not believe that from the Pacific to the Atlantic there was at that time a single American citizen who was not willing to adopt as the slogan of a war that should last a decade, if necessary, "Fifty-four forty or fight."

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask another question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. He undoubtedly recalls the fact that President Polk in his first message to Congress declared that our title to all of that territory lying up to 54° 40′ was beyond dispute and that that was the Democratic contention during the whole contest of 1844.

Mr. COCHRAN. I will answer that question without referring to President's messages. The boundary line of 54° 40′ was reached in the course of the very negotiations which resulted in fixing the boundary line between British Columbia and Alaska. When Russia asserted her jurisdiction down to the fifty-first parallel of latitude, the pretension was controverted by both Great Britain and the United States.

Each country entered into independent negotiation with Russia for the purpose of settling that controvery. We had little difficulty in reaching a settlement. Russia speedily agreed with us that as to the United States the boundary between the United States and Russian America should be 54° 40′, and that in reference to the territory below 54° 40′ we could fight it out with Great Britain, and Russia would negotiate as to everything above 54° 40′ and fight it out with England. Then followed the prolonged diplomatic struggle which terminated in so fixing the boundary between British Columbia and Russian America as to exclude Great Britain from a seaport on the Alaskan coast. In the teeth of this treaty, she has seized a seaport and contiguous territory in which the rich gold fields I have mentioned are situated.

Mr. Chairman, when is this controversy to be finally settled? Is there anything so intricate in it that it has been necessary to postpone a final settlement for five years, the period of British occupation?

What has led Great Britain to procrastinate and our Secretary of State to sit supinely, without even an attempt to close this controversy? It is this: There is absolutely no value in the land. It is not suitable for agricultural purposes. It is good for nothing, except mining purposes. It is said to be the richest mining field in the world, and this is probably true. During the four years of British occupation every prospect has been explored, every available mine has been developed, and British subjects, not American citizens, are the legal owners of all this property. No matter what may be the final outcome, the invader has accomplished his purpose. He has appropriated our gold mines to his own use.

The newspapers have told the story. Immediately after the occupation of the country American miners and prospectors were driven out of it by the discrimination of the British authorities against them, and to-day the subjects of His Majesty King Edward own everything that is worth owning; and when we shall finally conclude the negotiations, assuming that sovereignty will be graciously restored to us, what will be the result? Why, we will thereafter be allowed to furnish the constabulary, the judiciary, etc., for a British mining camp in which American citizens have hardly a dollar's worth of interest. What sense is there in claiming this piece of territory after everything of value within its borders has been absorbed by British speculators, traders, and miners?

Mr. Chairman, I have said, and I think I have proven by irrefutable testimony, that there is not the color of justification for England's claims in the premises. Probably apologists for the conduct of the Secretary of State will say that, even conceding all this, it was not improper to agree to settle the controversy by diplomacy. Well, let us, for the sake of argument, take this view of it.

Was it anything short of pusillanimous cowardice to surrender possession? England had not hinted at such a thing as a title to this land for seventy-five years. We had held possession of it for nearly forty years. If, without attempting to supplant us, without attempting to take the country by force, without attempting to extend her boundaries and sovereignty so as to include it, England had raised the pending question, the case would present a different aspect: this would have left the country within our jurisdiction pending a settlement. It would have enabled Americans instead of British subjects to take possession of the gold mines. This would not have enabled aliens to drive Americans out of the country. The object was larceny, and the traditional policy of the British Government was resorted to. First the country was forcibly occupied by an armed force. Then civil officials named by the Canadian government were installed there, and the claim of ownership followed on the heels of this flagrant insult to the American Republic.

Mr. Chairman, if, on account of his abounding love of the mother country, the Secretary of State felt constrained to condone this insult and hold a parley where self-respect demanded sterner measures, at least he should have said to the British Government: "Restore the status existing prior to the discovery of the gold mines, vacate the disputed territory, withdraw your official representatives from it, and we are ready to negotiate." Why was this not done?

It behooves Republicans high in authority to be prepared to answer this question. The American people will not much longer tolerate a party responsible for a policy so cowardly and so stupid as to excite the contempt and amazement of even the partisans of the Administration.

Mr. Chairman, I have not exaggerated the facts nor too strongly portrayed the insolence of the claims of Great Britain to ownership of part of our Alaskan possessions, nor overdrawn the pitiful spectacle presented by the high dignitary who is responsible for the foreign policy of the United States and for this sickening surrender of the rights of American citizens, who have been driven from American gold fields by the Canadian constabulary. I repeat the criticism which brought the gentleman from Iowa to his feet, and again declare that never in the history of diplomacy has there occurred a surrender of a great nation's rights and submission to insolence and insult so pitiful, so cowardly, so contemptible, so pusillanimous. [Loud applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Statehood Bill.

OF

HON. CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

February 11, 13, and 17, 1903.

The Senate having under consideration the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States—

Mr. DEPEW said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: We debated in Congress, on the platform, and in the newspapers for over sixty years the question whether a State had a right to retire from the Union. We fought over that question for five years in the bloodiest civil war of modern times. The result of that war settled forever the question of the nationality of the Republic of the United States. It settled forever that a State once in the Union could neither retire by its own volition nor be expelled by its sister Commonwealths. Under that decision, thus made permanent, the position of a State in the Federal Union is enormously enhanced, its value is enhanced, and the condition under which a Territory should be admitted should be more carefully inquired into than at any other previous period.

The State that comes into the Union now, so far as the House of Representatives is concerned, affects only in proportion to its population the legislation of the country. But the State which comes into the Union now has two United States Senators in this body. Those two Senators may represent a population wholly inadequate for a sovereign State, and at the same time they neutralize the wishes, neutralize the voice and the vote of the 7,000,000 people in New York, of the 6,000,000 in Pennsylvania, and of the millions in all the other States in the Union so far as they negative the one State which those two Senators oppose.

We, in considering this question, are not in the dark as to the conditions in these Territories which are included in the omnibus bill. The Committee on Territories took elaborate testimony, heard witnesses, and gathered a volume upon this question. Not satisfied with that, they appointed a subcommittee of their own number, who, at great labor, great trouble, and great sacrifice, spent months going through these Territories, meeting the inhabitants, ascertaining their views, finding what was the quality of the population, what were its productions, what the present conditions which justified statehood, and what were the future prospects.

Mr. BATE. Will the Senator from New York allow me to correct him there? I know he does not wish to misrepresent. The committee that went to investigate and make report on these Territories were not gone two or three months, as was stated by the Senator, but they were there only a few days. They went through those Territories, as large as they are, in a short time, spending five or six days in all, and on the moving train most of the time. I was appointed on the subcommittee, but I did not go. However, that was the result. I want to correct that statement at this time.

Mr. DEPEW. I do not want to misrepresent the committee——

Mr. BATE. I know the Senator did not, and therefore I took the liberty of correcting him.

Mr. DEPEW. But I judge from the report which the subcommittee has made, of the testimony which they took, of the distant places which they visited, the amount of travel they did, the number of cities, villages, ranches, and mines they saw, that they must have spent more than a few days in the Territory. In any event, they spent time enough to present here an elaborate report, the statements of which have been contradicted on this floor by statements, but none of them have been contradicted by testimony such as that upon which the report of the committee is based.

Now, the Government of the United States has become so vast, its interests have become so enormous, the questions which press upon Congress are so acute and require such immediate action, that we have been in the habit of investigating by committees, it being impossible for individual Senators out of the committees to ascertain the facts necessary for legislation.

So with the Government of the United States, with its vast matters of internal commerce, of foreign commerce, of internal revenue, of tariff, of Territories, of colonies, of finance, of currency, it has become common for the committees of this body to take up these questions, to examine them, as committees here do, and when their results are arrived at to present their report to the Senate.

Except when there is a political question involved, that report is never questioned. Except when there is politics involved, politics to be defeated or politics to be progressed, the conclusions of the committee are always accepted by the Senate, because the Senate has confidence in the committee and the committee knows what individual Senators can not by any possibility ascertain.

Now, here is a question which ought not to be political. It is a question affecting the integrity of the Senate, affecting the future legislation of our country, a question affecting the admission of six Senators into this body and of a larger number of representatives into the Electoral College for the election of a President. That question should not be political, but it should be decided upon its merits.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, we have here the extraordinary spectacle of one party lined up solidly for this statehood bill against the report of the committee and against the report of the subcommittee. Now, it would be impossible for a Senator on the Republican side or a Senator on the Democratic side to know as much on this question as the committee has ascertained, or to be familiar enough, as a matter of intelligence or information, to conscientiously vote against the conclusions of the committee. So when one of the sides of this Chamber stands pat for this omnibus bill as it is, refuses to discuss it, will not argue it, wants to vote upon it regardless of the report and the testimony, there must be hidden somewhere a political purpose other than the admission of these new States or their rights to be admitted.

There have been two exceptions only among our Democratic brethren on the policy of silence which they have imposed upon themselves. One was the impassioned utterance of the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS], demanding and calling and crying for the privileges of American citizenship for these poor people in the Territories of Arizona and Oklahoma and New Mexico who were deprived of them. It was a presentation not to move the judgment, but to move the sympathy for these poor people who were living in this condition, where apparently they were not enjoying the rights and the privileges and the immunities of American citizenship. But there was about that appeal this inconsistency: That sympathy was narrow. That sympathy had bounds and confines to it. That sympathy did not go out at all by a single word or expression to the Americans in the Indian Territory, numbering more than those in Arizona and New Mexico combined. There it might be said that they did not have the privileges of American citizenship. There it might be said that they could not own land, that they could not acquire titles to farms, that they could not vote, that they could not do any of the things which constitute American citizenship in the other Territories.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator made an interesting statement and a very significant one about there being in the Indian Territory more of white population than there is in Arizona and New Mexico combined. That is exactly true, but it is not all the truth. There are over one hundred thousand more there than in both the other Territories combined. I thought the Senator would not object to having that fact brought out.

Mr. DEPEW. I am very glad to be corrected, whether I minimize or whether I enlarge the fact.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There are about 400,000 or 450,000 people in the Indian Territory, some say 500,000, of whom not to exceed 80,000—and the best estimate puts it at about 70,000—are Indians, leaving perhaps 100,000 more white people in the Indian Territory than there are in the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona combined, according to the census.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, a moment, if the Senator pleases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. BATE. In this connection I wish to state that in the Indian Territory all the lands belonged to the 70,000 Indians, or whatever the number, in common and in tribal form, except small parts that have been given for railroad purposes or for town sites. They are the owners of that soil. They were there long ago by deeds from the United States in fee simple. They are there now; it is their home, and whoever comes there is more of a visitor than a proprietor.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. With reference to that, it is well known, as a matter of course, that allotments of Indian lands are very rapidly being made and have even now in a very large measure been completed. Further, the perhaps 400,000 white people who are there are not, as the Senator from Tennessee seems to think, interlopers, visitors, wanderers, adventurers. No, they are people who have come there to live. They have built towns and cities there which would be a credit to older and more settled parts of the country. They have developed resources. They have opened mines. They are there, Mr. President, and there to stay. It is not a floating, vagrant population, but a population composed of white citizens of intelligence, energy, and integrity, whom the Senator or any Senator on this floor might be proud to number among his constituents.

Further, Mr. President, those people have their churches. They have their Epworth Leagues. Although they have no laws by which they may have common schools, they have schools supported by popular subscriptions. The people have gone down in their own pockets. I make bold to say it is true that the condition of the white people in the Indian Territory as a mass is one of the most signal and brilliant illustrations of the capacity of the Anglo-Saxon to govern himself even without form of law or voice, so far as legislative enactment is concerned, that the history of the world has ever witnessed, because order prevails there, decency prevails there, and religious and educational work is going forward there, and all that, too, without the warrant of formal legislative enactment. I could imagine nothing, Mr. President, which is a higher tribute to the character and quality of that people than those facts.

Now, I doubt not the Senator from Tennessee did not mean to have us infer that they were mere visitors or people who were transient; that they were not quite worthy citizens of other States. As a matter of fact, they are good people and not mere visitors or people passing through.

What the Senator says about the Indian lands, of course, is entirely true. But that is a difficulty which is practical and which is being rapidly obviated.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] I should like to interject right here one or two suggestions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I am unwilling to sit silent and have words put into my mouth which I did not use. I did not say that the white people in the Indian Territory were vagrants or prowlers and lawbreakers, as has been stated by the Senator from Indiana, or anything of the kind. I said they were not the owners of the soil, and could not be while tribal relations existed. Whatever may have taken them there, whether enterprise, commercial gain, personal comfort, or whatever motive instigated them I do not know, but they are there, and there in vast numbers, and shoving aside the poor Indian—driving him out of his own home whether he will or not—and this in the face of solemn treaties, and the Government of the United States has been winking at it.

Mr. President, permit me to say in this connection that numbers of white men are there without proper authority and many of them have been for years by sufferance—by the grace of the Indians. We have treaties which have been negotiated between the Indians and the white people, treaties which are sacred, treaties which have been signed by the President of the United States. As far back as 1830 to 1836 the Indians were given not only the absolute right to stay there and own this particular property, but to be protected by the United States from the intrusions and molestation of the whites. I wish I had one of those treaties here before me that I might read it exactly as it was signed. I give the substance:

Those treaties guaranteed all these privileges. The Indians went into that Territory under the ægis of this United States Government. The Government promised that it would protect them against all outlaws and intruders and secure the titles to the lands, and yet the white man was the first to become an intruder and lay plans to get possession of their property. For the sake of peace and to feel secure in their rights, whatever they might be, they left the graves of their fathers and gave up their hunting grounds east of the Mississippi River and went to the prairies and hills of the West, under the solemn guaranty of our Government that they should own these lands, which is now the cause of contention, in fee-simple title and in tribal form; that they should be free from encroachment or disturbance by any outside influence, including the white people of the United States. Having lived among white people east of the Mississippi and seen their mode of life and their progressive spirit, they courted influences that would advance them in civilization. Since their removal to this beautiful country these Indians have only sought to exercise their rights—rights guaranteed by solemn treaty with our Government. They are out in a most beautiful country. The manner in which the Indians in the Indian Territory have conducted themselves has been applauded by all intelligent, upright, and Christian people. They have won the favor of all Christian churches and are communicants therein—the Methodist, the Baptist, the Presbyterian, the Episcopalian, the Catholic, all of whom have their churches and their schools among them; and the schoolhouses were put up at the common expense of the Indians and the teachers are paid by them.

Not only that, but they established courts of justice there after the fashion of ours. They have their judges, their lawyers, their jurors, their inferior courts, their clerks, and sheriffalty and constabulary; they have their witnesses, and all the machinery pertaining to the administration of justice amongst the most civilized nations. Their courts are conducted in a manner after the fashion of those in the United States, and they have been conducted most successfully.

Not only have they their district schools, but they have magnificent colleges. Among many others, there is one at Tahlequah which is one of the most beautiful structures and efficient institutions of learning west of the Mississippi River, the beautiful building costing from seventy-five to one hundred thousand dollars. It is for the education of girls.

The interest which they have manifested in the education and training of their girls is something which peculiarly attracts the attention of those who like and respect the Indians and wish to aid in elevating them in the scale of civilization. Mr. President, whenever you find a disposition to protect woman, to guard her honor and cultivate and refine her gentler nature—to lift her from a lower to a higher degree in the scale of educational and social life—you find evidences of an advancement in civilization and refinement. As I have said, they have established these schools for girls, and the one to which I have referred is the finest west of the Mississippi River, the cost of which has been paid out of the Indian funds, and no man will appreciate this more highly than the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], to whose courtesy I am indebted at this time for the permission of the floor.

You may examine the history of man and you will find that wherever civilization, struggling to lift itself from the shadows of darkness, arises and begins to shed abroad its beautiful and beneficent light the best evidence and the first indication of it is the care, the politeness, the deference, and the love and honor shown to woman. This is illustrated in the history of all nations that have grown great and powerful, notably Egypt and Greece. Rome in the days of her grandeur and glory gave greater admiration to woman than during any period of her history. In the days of her splendor woman was a queen as she sat upon her little throne in the social circle of her domestic surrounding. In Venice, in the day of her highest culture, woman was the charm of her social life. The salons of Paris and the courts of London have felt no less her power than her charm, and in our own land she has ever gone hand in hand with the advance of culture and refinement; and why not applaud the poor Indian in his struggle to gain a higher social scale by educating the girls of his nation?

Mr. President, the Indians not only have schools for men and boys, but, as I have said, they established, along with others, this magnificent institution for the education of girls, where they have been and can be educated and cultivated; and they speak our language, though it has been said by the opposers of this statehood bill that they do not speak our language. They have the printing press, and I have a copy of their newspaper here, printed on one side in the Indian language and on the other side in the English language.

These Five Civilized Tribes, comprising as they do the Indian Territory, have their farms, their flocks, and their herds; they have money of their own with which to purchase and to pay their debts. They have all these things and do all these things, and have advanced rapidly in their progress in the arts of civilized life and in the performance of Christian duty, but the white man has come among them, regardless of solemn treaties, and of course he is getting possession and control, as he always does when he exercises his power, and as he has always done when occasion offered at the expense of the poor Indian, and that, too, in violation of treaties that are honorable and sacred and that ought to be observed by all who are parties to them. These treaties the Indians have observed with particularity and good faith.

But here is a marked and peculiar condition of things. Here is this Territory set apart from 1830 to 1836 by solemn agreement made at noted treaties—and other great treaties—to be found in Indian history. Valuable lands were set apart and certain powers and privileges were given those Five Civilized Tribes west of the Mississippi River—the Cherokees, the Choctaws, the Chickasaws, the Muskogee or Creeks, and Seminoles. All those five tribes have their separate and distinct properties, and, Mr. President, they hold them as their ancestors held them—in tribal form—and would still thus hold them in the distant future but for that love of gain inspiring the white men to work schemes to enable them to possess themselves of their rich soil and valuable mines.

Mr. SPOONER. How many of those Indians have become citizens?

Mr. BATE. They have not become citizens to any great extent. They claim that unless they are of mixed blood they have the right to tribal relationship; and whenever you destroy the tribal relationship of the Indians, it is their history that they go to pieces; they become beggars, riding ponies and covering themselves with blankets. They should have been left alone and allowed to remain in their tribal relation. They desire that now; they seek it. They have their chiefs and governors, and subaltern tribal officers.

All of these Five Civilized Tribes have done their duty to this country. You can not show where they have violated their treaties in a single instance, and I doubt if the same can be said of any other people. Not only so, but they came to the rescue of the flag of the Stars and Stripes during our civil war. Some of them were under the Stars and Stripes and some along with us under the stars and bars interlocked with its cross of Saint Andrew. They furnished troops to the Army, but, like us, they were divided upon the great questions which divided the North and the South.

They have had their treaties since the war. The treaty of 1866, which in part was to adjust certain matters that grew out of the war, was agreed to, has been amended, and there have been other treaties since the war growing out of the fact, as I said, that some of the Indians had gone into the Confederate army and others into the Federal service, which treaties contained the usual guarantee unto them of their rights as individuals and their rights as a nation that are in the original treaties of 1830–1836.

A nation, Mr. President! That is a significant term. It is an admission that they possess original power; that they are a nation like ours; within a certain sphere and as a nation we have a right to deal with them, and we have so dealt with them. But in dealing with them of late years we have gone back upon our solemn agreements. I am sorry to say it, but it is true, nevertheless. Indeed, it is history, sir. Nothwithstanding the Indians have gone there under our encouragement, under the ægis of this Government, under the most sacred obligations, attested by the great seal of the United States and by the hand of the President of the United States, the white man has gone there and encroached upon their rights; we have trenched on them by degrees, until there is established there what we now call a white man's government, for there are 200,000 or 300,000 white men there and only 70,000 Indians, though the Indians own all the land. That is now the situation.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BATE. With pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. How far have these Indians become allottees of land under the laws of the United States?

Mr. BATE. I do not know to what extent, but the Dawes Commission came in under the protest of the rightful owners of the soil and it has done the work.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. They have almost entirely taken allotments, I understand,

Mr. BATE. Two or three of the nations have partially done so, and one or two of them divided upon the allotment question, I understand.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to ask the Senator this question: Of course no one would contend, I suppose, that the Indians who had acquired under a treaty property rights could be disturbed in their rights except so far as they agreed to it by accepting allotments; but the act of Congress provides, in general terms, that the allottees shall thereby become citizens of the United States.

Mr. BATE. Some of them have become citizens, I suppose, in that way. How many I do not know.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course, the Senator would not contend after they became citizens of the United States, while they would be protected in their property rights under a treaty, that they would be entitled to a separate government——

Mr. BATE. A tribal government.

Mr. SPOONER. A separate government?

Mr. BATE. No.

Mr. SPOONER. Or a national tribal government?

Mr. BATE. No; for the reason that they have been morally, if not physically, coerced into relaxing, if not yielding up their tribal relation. My idea is that men who have gone there and taken possession have gone there in violation of law, have gone there in the face of treaties which had been solemnly and sacredly made with those Indians. The men who have gone there are, in one sense, usurpers. They have taken the power from the Indians to govern that Territory; but when they become citizens of the United States they are like all other citizens and have their rights. But do you not remember two or three years ago the storm that broke out all over that country among those Indians in regard to the Dawes Commission? They saw that it meant to destroy their present and their ancestral mode of life, as the means to get from them the lands that the white man so coveted. They wanted a tribal form of government; it was was their right under solemn treaties, as it was by inheritance. But when a step of this kind was taken by an authority like that of the United States they were helpless, and, as a matter of course, the poor Indian had to succumb, for he was helpless. "Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord!"

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Tennessee permit me?

Mr. BATE. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator, as I understood him, stated that his idea was that any Americans who had gone down there without right were interlopers.

Mr. BATE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That being the case, Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator whether he would have the Government expel those interlopers from the territory which belongs to the Indians?

Mr. BATE. No, sir; but I will tell you, Mr. President, it should have been forbidden at the start; and it would have been forbidden had the United States performed its duty by using, if necessary, military force to protect those Indians when this began, as it had solemnly agreed to do. Now, complications have arisen that are embarassing. Now, the white men have possession of it and are there in large numbers, and in many instances have made terms with the Indians, and I think we can do nothing with them, and are constrained to let the matter work out the inevitable result. The Indians have to submit. They and we recognize that fact and they are submitting under coercion, notwithstanding they own the land, notwithstanding they have their herds there grazing on the richness of the mesas, although they now have their houses, instead of their cozy little tepees, which were formerly used under their simple mode of life. All that is progress—the white man's progress. White men have gone there wrongfully and now they have control, and we can not get them away. So we have to do the best we can, and the poor Indian is the sufferer.

I want to see the Government of the United States maintain their rights honestly, whatever they are; but how it can be done consistently with the laws passed by Congress and the treaties made beginning three-quarters of a century ago and coming down to recent years, which acknowledged their right to a tribal form of government and guaranteed protection to them in that form of government, I can not tell, and I can not see why it was asked to be done in open violation of the law of the land and of the treaty stipulations between them and the United States. Commercialism, however, seems to be rampant and finds an easy subject in the poor Indian.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The object of my question to the Senator from Tennessee was merely to bring to his attention the fact that even conceding it to be true that these white people had gone there originally without a right to do so, nevertheless they are there now—they are, as the Senator admits, a fixture now. That is a condition of the present and not an historical matter of the past with which we are called upon to deal.

Mr. BATE. That is true.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Whether I might agree with the Senator as to the historical part of it or not, I will neither agree nor disagree now; but the object of my question was merely to call the Senator's attention to the fact that what we have got to legislate concerning, what we have got to deal with, is not something which might be regrettable in the past, but something which now exists.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, it is never too late to do the right, the just, the honest thing.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But how would the Senator do that?

Mr. BATE. We have our obligations, which we have taken, to see that every right we guaranteed to those Indians is carried out. As I say, it is never too late to do good, to dare to do right.

I have nothing more to say except to repeat what I said originally, that these Indians are the owners of that soil. They have ceded only the land they have promised for your town sites, railroad tracks, and stations, etc. You have a right to nothing beyond that. They still own the soil, and those who do not own the soil, who are there merely as visitors in the first place, whether you call them intruders or interlopers or what not, are there in virtual possession of the lands and homes of the Indians.

These Indians are getting on well. They have their schools; they have plenty of money; they have established their courts; they have their churches, their houses, their associations, which are dear to them. I predict, if the Government goes on as it is doing and takes entire possession of that country, that of the 70,000 Indians now there there will not be 10,000 in a few years from now, and they will be blanket Indians out on the mountains, for the incomers will usurp their possessions and maybe forget the wrong to the red man.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from New York yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, no person could be found who would disagree with the concluding remarks of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE], that it is never too late to begin to do right; but sometimes we find that conditions which require action concerning the present do not square with abstract notions of what should be done had a prior historic fact been otherwise.

There is no Senator in this Chamber who could pay to womanhood a more beautiful tribute than the Senator from Tennessee has just paid, and no person more sincerely or tenderly agrees with that lofty tribute than I do. I, in common with every other man of our blood, regard the proud position of woman in our civilization as its chief lustre and brightest glory, and I am glad to hear, Mr. President, that the Indians of the Indian Territory have suddenly—not, perhaps, suddenly—but have at least begun to emulate the very best that can be found in our, or in any other, civilization. When I was told that, Mr. President, a fact that I did not know before, it was easier for me to understand why it was that at the great statehood convention at Oklahoma City, composed of 2,000 delegates from both the Indian Territory and Oklahoma, asking for single statehood, that convention should have as its temporary presiding officer an Indian of the blood from the Indian Territory, and as its permanent presiding officer an Indian of the blood from the Indian Territory.

If it be true, as the Senator from Tennessee says, that colleges almost equal to those that we establish in the States—and we can judge from the Senator's words that they are equal indeed to them—have been established there, colleges for girls, colleges for men, farmhouses, and everything else that accompanies civilization, I say that we can well understand how it is that they have reached a point where they would send to the convention for single statehood their most prominent chiefs; and it is a pertinent thing to call the attention of the Senate to the fact at this juncture that at this convention, the greatest one ever called in Oklahoma or the Indian Territory, or any other Territory or State in the history of this Republic—and that is not an extravagant statement, but a moderate one concerning a thing like this—should have among its delegates Indians from the Indian Territory and as its presiding officers two of their most prominent men.

It is not probable, Mr. President, that these men, delegates and officers of that convention, would have asked a thing or put themselves on record for a thing which was an injustice to the people whom they led; it is not probable, Mr. President, that they would participate in a movement which had as its inevitable result the destruction of justice to their own people; and it is probable, Mr. President, if they have reached the advanced stage which the Senator says they have, that just that thing which they did do is the thing which we had a right to expect.

I do not know that there is very much disagreement between the Senator from Tennessee and myself with respect to this. He does not deny the high quality of the white population down there and I do not deny the high quality of the Indian population down there. I think they have demonstrated their capacity by their deeds. Very well. Then we have simply the condition of a great population in that great Territory developing its resources, not having any racial conflicts—that is a significant fact, is is not?—no racial conflict in the Indian Territory between the whites and the Indians; not a difficulty heard of; no massacres of whites by Indians, no assaults upon Indians by whites.

That does not indicate, does it, Mr. President, that these men regard themselves as having cruel injustice practiced upon them, but, living together in peace and harmony and mutually developing the remarkable resources of that great Territory, they practically, with a unanimity hardly heard of before, come here and ask of this Congress a thing which the commercial situation, which the natural elements of the whole situation themselves declare as being the right thing to do with a population like this, with a population sure to increase.

If, as the Senator from Tennessee says, the Indians must decrease under natural conditions and contact with the whites, etc., the reason becomes still greater. If they are not worthy citizens, is there any reason why the opinions of all those people should not be listened to by this Congress, not only as to their future condition, but that of their children and their children's children for all time to come? That is what I call attention to.

I am very much obliged to the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] for the time that he has given to the Senator from Tennessee and myself. I thought that the Senator from New York would be glad at this juncture, when he was making a comparative statement of statistics, to have it brought to his attention and the attention of the Senate that not only what he said is true, but that it is true by a hundred thousand more. This thing can not be dwelt on too much, because until this debate sprung up it was the common belief of this country and the belief of most of this Senate that the Indian Territory was inhabited chiefly by Indians.

That was the extent of the information which the country had upon this Territorial question, and in the debate here before I called attention to the fact that in an editorial in a great metropolitan paper, usually very well informed, it was stated that the committee's substitute was not admissible because in that Territory there were about 400,000 Indians. This debate has informed the country for the first time, and the most of the Senate for the first time—for many Senators have talked to me about it, and I know I had that view myself until I came to investigate it—that the Indian Territory, simply because it is called the Indian Territory, is not inhabited by Indians, but by whites, flesh of our flesh, bone of our bone, blood of our blood, taking there all the habits and traditions of our race and all that they have learned as citizens of other States.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from New York yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. It is my recollection that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] in the very able and exhaustive speech which he made upon this floor, stated that by some act of 1890 or 1891 Congress had made citizens of the Indians in the Indian Territory independent of the question of allotments. I should like to ask the Senator whether my recollection is accurate?

Mr. NELSON. That is perfectly correct. By the act of March 3, 1901, 31 Statutes at Large, page 1447, every Indian in the Indian Territory is made a citizen of the United States. There is also a general law, commonly called the Dawes allotment act, under which every Indian who owns an allotment becomes a citizen. But under the act to which I first referred every Indian in the Territory, whether he belongs to these Five Nations or otherwise, is a full citizen of the United States to all intents and purposes.

Mr. SPOONER. I thank the Senator from New York.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, I am very glad of this interruption, because it reveals what I did not know before, that there are 100,000 more Americans in the Indian Territory than there are in the combined white population of Arizona and New Mexico. This adds to the gravity of the charge which I have made, that the Democratic party seems to confine its sympathy to the Mexicans of New Mexico rather than extend it to the Americans of the Indian Territory; that while they want to grant these privileges, statehood rights and American citizenship, while they are yearning to give them to the Mexicans of New Mexico and to the Mormons of Arizona, as has been exhibited by the very eloquent speech of the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BATE), they have not a single throb for the 450,000 white Americans in the Indian Territory.

I listened to the speech of my friend from Tennessee with the greatest interest, as I always do, and that beautiful tribute of his to womanhood did justice to his chivalric heart and to his glorious record as a soldier. He could not speak otherwise than in those high terms of American women and of Indian women; but I wish, while he was telling us of what the Indians were doing for their girls, placing them upon that high plane of civilization, that he had spoken one word at least in behalf of these 450,000 white people, men and women, to enable them to get into the Union, to enjoy the rights of citizenship, and not charged them with being interlopers, charged them with being where they had no right to be, charged them almost by implication with having the purpose of taking away from the Indians their lands by some process of expropriation, but that he had come out nobly and said, "I am in favor of amending this bill by adding the Indian Territory to Oklahoma, which the Indians themselves apparently want, in order that the privileges of statehood may be extended over all this population."

Then I have noticed another lack of sympathy on the part of the Democratic brethren. They have not one word to say for the 100,000 white people in Alaska, that they may have the inestimable privileges of statehood and the inestimable privileges of American citizenship that can only be had through statehood.

I have heard from our friends on the other side the most frightful and calamitous predictions as to what would happen if Porto Rico should become a State, and yet Porto Rico has established within one year a school system which has called hundreds and hundreds of school-teachers from the United States. The last report of the governor of Porto Rico shows that they are taxing themselves for these schoolhouses; that they are erecting them at every crossroads, and that within a year there will not be a child in Porto Rico who will not have the benefits of an American school. The testimony is that not only the children but the adults are attending those schools in order to acquire the English language, in order to be able to read American newspapers in the English language, in order to legislate in the English language, and in order to be in all respects American citizens.

There is not one word of sympathy for the Porto Ricans, who are in a condition not even so fortunate, so far as the opportunities of American citizenship are concerned, as are the people in the Territory of New Mexico. And yet there is an abounding sympathy for the Mexicans—90,000 of them in New Mexico—who for three generations have not made an attempt to acquire the English language or to become American citizens. It seems to me that the position is as inconsistent as possible, and that it can only be accounted for by some high method of politics.

I beg pardon for making the statement that there has been no argument advanced by our Democratic friends who are standing solidly and silently in an unbroken phalanx behind their distinguished leader, my able friend the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], for there has been one speech on that side—very eloquent, very exhaustive, and very convincing; I refer to the eloquent and able argument on behalf of statehood which just closed to-day, when the venerable and eloquent Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] took his seat. For four and five hours, sir, the Senator from Alabama advocated the omnibus bill. He based it upon the fact that the Indian is far superior to the white man when you give him an equal opportunity. He based it upon the fact that we have violated or propose to violate the protocol which exists between Colombia and some other Central American State.

Under those conditions it seems to me that the argument for statehood as it comes from the Democratic side presents features which it is almost impossible for us to meet. There is this difficulty about the presentation made on behalf of statehood by the eloquent, the able, and the venerable Senator from Alabama. If the 27,000 Indians in Arizona are superior to the 90,000 whites who are there; if the 30,000 Indians in New Mexico are superior to the Mexicans who are there, the difficulty is they are in the minority and they can not exercise those high qualities which, as the Senator says, have passed their names down through all the centuries since the Pilgrims first landed on Plymouth Rock. It may be that there are in New Mexico and Arizona, among the 27,000 in one Territory and the 30,000 in another, men who might make those Territories, if they came in as States, worthy of statehood if their patriotic and intelligent purposes could be carried out—men like these, who have been named by the Senator from Alabama: Black Hawk, Brandt, Canastogo, Comanche, Egeromont, Ensamore, Jim Fife, George Sagamore, and George Guess.

Mr. President, with 27,000 such patriots of a race which has done such heroic deeds in one Territory and 30,000 in another I am not sure, if I could agree with the Senator from Alabama in his estimate of the race, but that I should vote for the statehood bill if the Senator from Pennsylvania would consent to have a clause put in their constitutions that none but Indians should vote.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Did the Senator from Alabama mention the name of Geronimo?

Mr. DEPEW. Geronimo is not in the list.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. He is the Indian gentleman and patriot who was the leader of the Indians of Arizona. Since the Senator from Alabama was talking about the heroes, I thought perhaps he was included in the list. I wish to ask the Senator whether he is?

Mr. DEPEW. I have no doubt, answering the question of the Senator from Indiana, that from the stand taken by my distinguished friend, the Senator from Alabama, Geronimo was a patriot, fighting for his lands, fighting for his country, fighting for his wife, fighting for his children, fighting for his people, but that is not my view. That seems to be the view presented by our Democratic friends in the arguments which they offer for the omnibus statehood bill.

Mr. President, why do our friends on the other side stand in such solid, silent phalanx behind this measure? They will deny that there is politics in it. The public press says there are sure to be two Democratic Senators from Arizona and two from New Mexico, and that Oklahoma is already going the same way because of the large immigration that is going in from Texas, Arkansas, and Missouri. So it might be claimed, if the press is correct, that there will be six Democratic Senators added to this body and nine Democratic votes in the electoral college.

I make no such charge, because our Democratic friends would never move for a measure like this on considerations such as six Senators and nine votes in the electoral college. They have never before been united on a question of statehood. They have never before shown this anxiety for the admission of new States. On the contrary they have opposed many of them and given reasons which I confess ought to have prevailed.

I want to say—and I say this from experience and observation—that while the old lady of the Democracy, who is so frequently typified in picture and in caricature, is still young, still frisky, and still attractive, and while she has been successful in her flirtations for a hundred years, flirting with the Greenbacker and capturing him, flirting with the Populist and capturing him, flirting with the Silverite and absorbing him, that when she undertakes this most dangerous flirtation with that most dangerous and fascinating gentleman whom she is now following, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], she is in more danger than she ever was in her life. [Laughter.] He has hypnotized her, and before he gets through I do not know what will happen. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, there have been many reasons for making States. Nothing more able and eloquent has been presented on that question here than the speech of my friend the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER]. But in the making of States there are rules which apply to different ages and periods that do not apply to others. When the Republic was first formed one question which met our fathers on the threshold was how to make equal the small and the big States; how Delaware and Rhode Island were to have their equal voice and action compared with New York, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts.

It was necessary then in the forming of a government to make a compromise. We were not then letting in new States, either to expand and enlarge our suffrage and our power or to diminish it. But there were thirteen colonies which had been fighting together to form a more perfect union, and they had to compromise. That compromise was that population should govern in the popular branch, but, without regard to population, the sovereignty of the State should be represented by ambassadors in the Senate of the United States, elected by the legislatures of the States, representing in their corporate capacity the sovereignty of the Commonwealth. But any obligation to let in a new State ceased with the formation of this compact, ceased with the creation of the Republic under these conditions.

But we were then a small country so far as population was concerned. It was necessary for us to extend our power along the Ohio and to the Mississippi, and so a rule was adopted, which, if applied now, would rule out this bill absolutely—a rule of proportionate population, by which, under the ordinance of 1787, whenever the Territory reached 60,000 inhabitants it could be and should be and must be admitted into the Union. The same proportionate number now would require nearly eleven hundred thousand for Statehood. Everybody knew the conditions of that territory. Everybody knew that it had fertile plains, that it had vast possibilities of agriculture, that it had abundant and abounding opportunities for great populations in the future. Everybody knew that we were taking no risk whatever of admitting States which would stand still or go backward.

When that rule had worked out in that way, then it became necessary to apply another rule imposed upon us by the necessity of the hour. We had to acquire the territory of Louisiana against the conscientious scruples and prejudices of President Jefferson, in order to round out our country and to grant to us the mouth of the Mississippi, essential to the growth, population, commerce, and agriculture of those Northwestern States. But in acquiring that territory, already settled, we had to compromise again with France and compromise with Spain as to the terms of concession. Of course, France wanted to look after the Frenchmen in Louisiana and Spain wanted to take care of her subjects in Florida. So treaties were made under which, without regard to population, but in conformity to those treaties, the States of the Louisiana purchase came in.

There it was known again that these Territories were rich in fruitful soil, rich in irrigating streams, rich in everything in the virgin condition of the country which promises population commerce, trade, wealth, and prosperity of every kind.

Then came the dark period of our history, when it was compromise again in the admission of States—compromise between slavery and freedom. The very able men who were protecting the institution of slavery saw that the constantly increasing populations in free communities were to people these western areas and would bring in, not only to the House of Representatives but to the Senate, majorities which would be hostile to the institution of slavery. Already in the House of Representatives the preponderance of free sentiment had become alarming to the slave oligarchy, and they made up their minds that their only safety was, without regard to population, to become intrenched in the Senate.

Under that compromise it is curious to see how the different States came in. A glance at the dates shows how it worked. Maine, in 1820, was offset by Missouri in 1821; Indiana, in 1816, by Mississippi; Illinois, in 1818, by Alabama; Arkansas, in 1836, by Michigan; Florida by Texas, and California by another Southern State. In order to protect themselves it was also provided and understood that as these free communities grew, when Texas was annexed, Texas might be divided into four Commonwealths, which would naturally be on the side of slavery.

Then came the civil war. Then we got out from compromises by which there should be a balance of power between freedom and slavery in the Senate of the United States; and then came political conditions. Then we began to admit States for votes; States to pass constitutional amendments; States to get certain legislation which was regarded by the party in power as essential for the country. Under those political conditions West Virginia came in and Nevada came in and other States came in. Several of the mountain States came in under those political conditions in the hope or the certainty of votes for the time being without regard to the future.

But, Mr. President, we have now come to a period when none of these conditions and none of these considerations exist. We are not forming a government now. We are the most powerful nation in the world, and consolidated into a nation. We are not compromising between slavery and freedom now. That question has disappeared forever. We are not acting upon political considerations now, for there are no pending measures for which more votes are needed in the United States Senate—measures of such magnitude, in the view of the majority of this body, that we can risk the whole future of equal State representation to get a few votes for the hour. That condition no longer exists. It has passed away.

The only condition under which the admission of a State should now be thought of or discussed is, regardless of politics, how it lines up in population, in the character of that population, in area, and in the possibilities of a future with reference to equal statehood in the Union. Judged by these considerations, I have failed to hear, I have failed to see presented or to hear read, one single argument, statement, or item of statistics that for one moment justifies the passage of the pending statehood bill and the admission of these States into the Union.

It is admitted by the Senators who have spoken, so far as they have spoken, in favor of the statehood bill that New Mexico and Arizona are not up to the standard, but they say that is because they are Territories; that if they were created States, population would flow in and capital would go in and Arizona and New Mexico would speedily become equal to the other great and growing and populous Nothwestern States, with their splendid futures. The difficulty with this argument is that we are presented right at its threshold with Oklahoma. Oklahoma has no statehood. Oklahoma is under Territorial conditions. But while New Mexico has been nearly sixty years in the condition of a Territory, while Arizona has been forty years a Territory, Oklahoma, as against the sixty and against the forty years, has been only eleven years a Territory. Yet Oklahoma in those eleven years has attained four times the population of either Arizona or New Mexico in fifty years. Oklahoma has five times the wealth of Arizona or New Mexico in the fifty years. Oklahoma has ten times all that constitutes a prosperous business community.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DEPEW. I will.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from New York has mentioned two of the principal claims of those in favor of statehood, which are that statehood in itself by some mysterious process would increase population and increase the investment of capital. The Senator is answering that. But I think the Senator himself can give testimony on that point, and that is the reason why I rise to interrupt him. The Senator from New York is not only the first orator of our land, but he is also one of those men who is justly entitled to the name that is so often used, a captain of industry, and a man who all his life has had to do with the investment of large capital.

I wish to ask the Senator whether in his long and very wide experience he ever knew capital to be invested in a place simply because it was in a State? I want to ask the Senator whether it is not true, as we who have nothing to do with capital in a practical way understand it to be upon theory, that capital invests for the dividends to be returned? I want to ask him whether it is not true that if mines exist it is quite immaterial whether they are on the one side or the other side of a Territorial or a State line; that if farms are fertile, streams are full, rainfall adequate, and resources abundant at a given place, that is the place to which capital goes? Is not that what attracts capital, and not merely because some gentleman who wants to be governor wants a different form of government, equally free? I want to call to the aid of the Senator's argument his own personal experience, because his word upon this subject is not the word of opinion, but the word of weight based upon experience.

Mr. DEPEW. Answering the question of the Senator from Indiana, statehood is not the attraction for capital. Statehood is not the incentive for enterprises. I know of numberless expeditions of explorations, and a great number of enterprises in the course of exploitation or of operation where capitalists have gone to Mexico. There are scores of American companies which have gone to Mexico and invested their capital under the laws and the conditions that prevail in that country. There are scores of American companies, with American capital, that have gone to the different countries of South America for the building of railroads, for the opening and working of mines, for the running of cattle ranches, for every industry in which money can be invested with the possibility of large returns. Statehood has nothing to do with the capitalist. It is the opportunity. It is the riches that may be had. It is the return which is possible upon the investment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is said that trade follows the flag. Then capital follows opportunity.

Mr. DEPEW. Capital follows opportunity. Capital wants to be safe, and yet capital takes tremendous risks when there is opportunity of gain by investing in these South American countries, where it is liable at any moment if not to be seized at least to have its operations suspended by revolution.

Mr. President, how is it that Oklahoma gets on so many times more rapidly in everything that constitutes a healthful and prosperous community than New Mexico and Arizona—in ten years almost ten times as much, if you take it all, as those two Territories have done in fifty years? Why is it?

Mr. HOAR. And more than some of the old States.

Mr. DEPEW. Yes; more than some of the old States. As the Senator from Massachusetts says, Oklahoma has increased more rapidly than several of the old States. It is because Oklahoma has the climate, it has the soil, it has the streams, and it has that bounteous flow of rains from heaven and the soil to receive and absorb it, without which no harvest can come to the husbandman; that is the reason.

I know of no picture in the story of settlement, no picture in the creation of nations or of States, which reads so like a romance of that of the settlement of Oklahoma. I remember how my blood was stirred as the accounts filled the papers day by day of the row of American citizens lined up in every kind of vehicle—men, women, and children—held by the Army until the clock should strike 12 of the day when the barrier was removed and the Indian title was eliminated. And how the moment that the gun was fired along that line of hundreds of miles the rush took place across the border; and how that night—that night—there were thousands of families living under their own vine and fig tree, who had located their 160 acres of homestead; and that there were 20,000 people in the city of Oklahoma within twenty-four hours. There were not only 20,000 people in the city of Oklahoma, embracing men who had never met before, but there were women who had never before had any social relations together, strangers, and yet in forty-eight hours they had as Americans an American government. In forty-eight hours they had their mayor, they had their council, they had their magistrates, they had their policemen, they had their jail.

Mr. BURTON. May I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. Did it ever occur to the Senator that the advertisement and the method following the advertisement of the opening of Oklahoma appealed strongly to the venturesome spirit of the American people and did much to bring the people there?

If any other Territory would have had a like advantage it would also have had a population; I mean, if it had been advertised in the same way. Is it not true that we go, or we want to go, where we are told we shall not? The very fact that settlement was held back to a given period of time caused people to flock there so as to break over.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Why did they stay?

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, I can appreciate what would have been the reverse of the picture of those happy homes in Oklahoma if those thousands of families had landed upon the alkali plains of Arizona or slept on the cacti of New Mexico. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Applause is not permitted in the galleries, and it must not be repeated.

Mr. DEPEW. I can see those happy people finding pasture for their stock, finding water for their cattle, finding a soil which would yield them support for the future; laying out their schoolhouse here, staking out their village there, locating the courthouse yonder; looking where the churches were to be of the different denominations, and looking around among the likely people among them for their members of the legislature, for their Delegate in Congress. I can imagine what would have happened if those 30,000 people had landed on the alkali plains. I can see the cattle dying all around them. I can see them with their parched lips and eyes crying to heaven for water that does not exist, and they can not get back to the water which they left behind.

Mr. President, you might advertise the desert of Sahara and throw it open to the populations of all the world for all time to come, and there would be no rush of those people from southern Europe who are now crowding to our ports in order to find home and liberty and citizenship.

Why do not these people go to Nevada? She invites these populations. Millions of acres are there awaiting the husbandman; millions of acres are there awaiting the plow. But the trouble is that through the baked lands of unirrigated alkali the plow will not work and water does not exist. It is one of the beneficences, as also one of the limitations of Providence, that human beings can not live and can not make prosperous communities where harvests will not grow and water will not run.

I have here a little bit of doggerel, which I did not intend to read, but which I will read for the benefit of my friend the Senator from Kansas, and it may be interesting.

What constitutes a State?

I am sure my friend the Senator from Kansas, in his eloquent trips through that growing Commonwealth which illustrates in its own productive power what can be done where nature is beneficent, has often thrilled the corn grower and the coal digger of Kansas with "What constitutes a State?"

What constitutes a state?
Not high-raised battlement or labored mound,
Thick wall, or moated gate;
Not cities proud with spires and turrets crowned;
* * * * *
No! Men, high-minded men,
* * * * *
Who know their rights, and, knowing, dare maintain.

So wrote the famous poet, Sir William Jones, a hundred years ago. But under this bill the poet of the cactus and alkali with broken meter will say:

What constitutes a state?
Unbounded acres and unnumbered miles,
Where harvests will not grow, though nature smiles.
Where barren mountains and alkali plains
Deny the toiling settler labor's gains.
Where wealth does not accumulate, nor men decay,
For the soil is parched by night and day.
And man who knows his rights is up betimes
To seek his fortune in more genial climes?

[Laughter.]

Arizona, Mr. President, has 73,000,000 acres. She has been forty years a Territory. She has been promoted by every process by which an advertisement can reach a human being who is adventurous or has a dollar to invest. Out of her 73,000,000 acres she has, after forty years, 255,000 acres of farm land.

New Mexico has 78,000,000 acres. She was captured by General Kearny in 1846, sixty years ago. She had then a population which had been there for nearly three hundred years—a population of agriculturalists—and yet in three hundred years of settlement and sixty years of Territorial condition, with all the privileges of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States and the laws which apply to American citizenship, out of 78,000,000 acres she has only 327,000 acres under cultivation, while Oklahoma in ten years has reduced 6,000,000 acres to cultivation, against 255,000 acres in Arizona and 327,000 acres in New Mexico.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I ask——

Mr. BURTON. May I interrupt the Senator from New York for a moment?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. How much greater is the product of the mines of Oklahoma than the product of the mines of New Mexico and Arizona?

Mr. DEPEW. Mining populations do not create States. A mining population alone is a shifting population; it is not a settled population. Tombstone, in Arizona, had, when it was a mining center, 12,500 people. The mines gave out, and in a week it had 1,200.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It has 600 now.

Mr. DEPEW. And now it has 600.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, will the Senator permit me? He spoke about the quantity of land in cultivation in Arizona. To make his contrast exactly accurate I will state that there are in Arizona this year under actual cultivation not the amount the Senator described, little as that is, but 185,000 acres; that is all.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. Before the Senator begins, do I understand him to take the position that mining is not a stable industry? I should be very much pleased indeed if he would give in contrast with the figures he has just now given the product of the mines of Arizona and New Mexico as against the product of the mines of Oklahoma.

Mr. DEPEW. I do not know, Mr. President, that there are any mines in Oklahoma. I know that the wealth produced in Oklahoma is nearly ten times as much as the wealth produced in Arizona or in New Mexico, with all their mines, their cattle industry, their agriculture, and everything else. When you speak of mines constituting a State, I point to the history of the introduction of Nevada. Nevada was brought in here for political reasons. The party in power wanted two votes in the United States Senate, and they let Nevada in, and they let in two of the most brilliant men who ever were upon this floor.

Mr. HOAR. They wanted to carry the thirteenth amendment.

Mr. DEPEW. They wanted two votes to carry the thirteenth amendment. One of those brilliant Senators went from New York to be a Senator from Nevada.

Mr. BURTON. I do not want to interrupt the Senator so as to annoy him, and I see that an interruption does not.

Mr. DEPEW. No; I am very glad to be interrupted. I am seeking for information.

Mr. BURTON. Since the Senator takes the position that mining, which I always thought was one of the great industries of the world, does not produce wealth, I wish he would give us, if he can, in contrast or in comparison, whichever it may be called, the wealth produced from the mines of West Virginia and Pennsylvania, stating the proportion to the total products of these States and what they have had to do with making those States so rich.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from New York permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The question of the Senator from Kansas is evidently intended to show that Oklahoma has no mines and that New Mexico has mines, and that therefore there are more resources in New Mexico than in Oklahoma. But it does not meet the comparison, even if it could be a comparison, which I do not think it can be, for the reason that the committee substitute proposes to make one State out of Oklahoma and Indian Territory, and that in the Indian Territory there are very rich coal mines, highly developed; mines of iron and mines of marble. While I have not the figures directly at hand, I venture the suggestion that the mines of the Indian Territory, which are a part of this new State which the committee proposes to make, exceed in value even now, under all the adverse circumstances, not with a Territorial but with no form of government, those of New Mexico.

Mr. BURTON. May I interrupt the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. Then I understand the Senator from Indiana to contradict the Senator from New York?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Your understanding is poor, I will say. I did not contradict him.

Mr. BURTON. Your argument contradicts him. I understand that the Senator from Indiana now insists that mines do have very much to do with making a State, and that in order to make a big, growing, rich State you are going to rest upon the mines of the Indian Territory and attach it to Oklahoma. I will state the point I am trying to get at.

I asked the Senator from New York to give us something about the wealth of the mines of Arizona and New Mexico. Then when he said that mines would not make a State I called attention to the mines of West Virginia and Pennsylvania as having more to do than any other thing in making those States rich and prosperous.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, since the Senator addresses me, he did not understand me to say that I differed with the Senator from New York, or that either the Senator from New York or myself or any of us rests statehood upon this industry or that industry or the other industry; but we rest it upon the inherent resources of the Territory and upon the natural conditions which have brought or are sure to bring people there. People are what make States, and the only thing resources have to do with it is that resources bring the people and resources keep the people.

Now, the Senator from New York is entirely right when he says that a mining population, and particularly a mining population based upon mines of silver or gold, or even copper, is no substantial basis for statehood, for the reason that that industry is transient, whereas statehood is permanent.

The other night we had here a debate which, perhaps, lasted for two hours. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] participated in that debate. In the course of that debate it appeared that Nevada had actually shrunk in population since she had been admitted into the Union. The Senator from Nevada said that at the time of Nevada's admission Virginia City had 27,000 people in it, and now it has only 4,000 or 5,000, and that the reason for that remarkable shrinkage was the fact that the mines had become exhausted.

Now, Mr. President, when we are doing something that will last as long as this earth endures, the Senator from New York I think is exactly right, in the light of the history of what are called mining camps, when he says that the industry of mining alone is no permanent basis for a State.

The Senator from Kansas cites Pennsylvania. Mining is not the only resources of Pennsylvania. While I have not the figures at hand at all, and I have not examined them, I will venture the assertion that it will be found that the great majority of the people of Pennsylvania do not depend upon mining at all, but upon farming and manufacturing and other industries not directly connected with mining. I think the Senator from Kansas himself will probably admit, on second thought, that that is true.

The mines of Pennsylvania are coal mines, vast deposits put in the earth for the purpose of fuel; they are not like the mines the Senator from New York refers to.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly; I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the number of the people engaged in mining in those two Territories is very insignificant. There are only about 7,000 people of all classes engaged in mining in Arizona and a little over 4,000 in New Mexico, and the mining of gold, silver, and coal all combined is very limited in New Mexico.

The only mining industry of any consequence in either of these Territories is in Arizona, and that is in reference to copper. The gold output and the silver output in Arizona is very limited, and in New Mexico it is still more limited. In New Mexico they have a little coal, but even that is limited.

The mining industry of those two Territories combined does not equal to-day the mining industry that is going on within the limits of the Indian Territory. There are more people engaged in coal mining and in the asphalt and coal industry in the Indian Territory to-day than there are engaged in mining of all classes in Arizona and New Mexico.

Mr. BURTON. Then, I understand, if the Senator will allow me, that you do claim that mining has very much to do with the development of a country?

Mr. NELSON. I wish to say to the Senator from Kansas that one effect of the mining population in Arizona is that they have a law (I take it that it is for the benefit of the miners) by which they keep saloons and gambling houses and other places of resort open day and night, Sundays, and all the year round. I think that is one of the incidents that belong to a mining population. If it was not for the fact that there are mining camps they probably would not have such a law and such license in that country.

Mr. BURTON. I notice, as far as saloons are concerned, that they are in a great many States, except my own. But I call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the fact that manufactures and the sources of wealth of West Virginia and Pennsylvania depend upon the mines.

If you say that Nevada has gone back, I would answer that by saying that seventy-five years ago farm lands were worth more in New England than they are now. They have gone back also.

Now, another thing, while I am on my feet, if the Senator will allow me, I do not believe this country has ever lost anything by the admission of Nevada. I do not believe that the general legislation of this country has suffered. I believe Nevada has contributed her full share toward wise and beneficent legislation ever since the State has been admitted into the Union.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if Nevada, taking the situation exactly as it is at this moment, would now apply for admission as a State, would he vote to admit her?

Mr. BURTON. I certainly would, Mr. President. I would vote to admit all the Territories on this main continent where the people want to become States and exercise all the high privileges of American citizens.

Mr. NELSON. Would the Senator from Kansas vote to admit Alaska and Porto Rico at this time?

Mr. BURTON. Alaska is not a Territory, neither is Porto Rico.

Mr. NELSON. Oh, yes; Porto Rico is.

Mr. BURTON. Not in the sense in which New Mexico and Arizona are Territories.

Mr. NELSON. No; not in that sense, I admit.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask the Senator from New York to yield to me a minute upon this particular point about Nevada.

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. We had all that debate out the other night, and of course it is not necessary to go over it again. I do no wish to reflect upon Nevada. The rules of the Senate forbid it, and I have no disposition to do it, if it is true. But the question is this: Is it the carrying out of our democratic form of government—that is to say, the representation of people instead of land—that 18,000 voters in Nevada should have as much power in deciding all the policies of this country, foreign and domestic, as the million or more people in Kansas have?

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator addresses that question to me, if he will allow me——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. I will say, as it bears upon part of the debate which has been heretofore had, that in one of the counties of Kansas, in the recent election, less than 200 votes were polled to elect a member of the legislature and in another one of the districts over 4,000 votes were polled to elect a member of the legislature.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I should say that you have a very bad apportionment.

Mr. BURTON. The apportionment is a good and a wise one, and everybody in the State believes in it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Perhaps that throws some light upon the question as to whether 18,000 votes in Nevada should have an equal voice upon the floor of the Senate with the State of Kansas. The point about it is that the whole principle of popular representation is at stake in this matter. Where it is based upon an industry such as gold mining or otherwise, where it may decrease to a proportion that is abhorrent to the sense of reason of every man, it is a thing which should give us serious concern before we do it, because once done it is done forever.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, I regret that the Senator from Kansas should be taken out of this debate. [Mr. BURTON in the chair.] I will, however, answer the question of the Senator from Kansas, and without attacking Nevada. That is ancient history. It emphasizes the fact that when a State is once in the Union it is there to stay. Nevada might get to a condition where the only population would be her two United States Senators, and she would still stay, and those two Senators would neutralize the Senator from Kansas and his colleague upon matters which might be vital to Kansas and to which these two Senators were opposed.

As to the question of mining, take a purely mining State and what are the prospects of its growth? Nevada is the illustration. Nevada had 42,000 in 1870. She had 62,000 in 1880. That was at the height of the productive power of the Comstock mines. She had 45,000 in 1890 and 42,000 in 1900.

Now, it is a fact that a State can become prosperous and populous and grow without mines, but a mining Territory can not grow unless it has agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and varied interests. Senators cite the case of the New England States, and the fact that land is worth less in Massachusetts to-day for agricultural purposes than it was one hundred years ago. That may be true. But Massachusetts is so situated——

Mr. HOAR. I beg the Senator's pardon. I do not wish to unnecessarily interrupt him, but I should like to state the county where I dwell is the fourth or fifth county—I have not looked at the last census—in the whole Union in the value of its agricultural products. There are abandoned farms in Massachusetts on the hilltops. For some unexplained reason, probably to get rid of malaria, the Puritan settlers of Massachusetts settled on the tops of hills. Most of our old country towns where there are hills have their old town centers on the very tops of the hills without regard to the quality of the land. There are old rocky farms that have diminished in value, but to say that the agricultural lands in Massachusetts have, as a whole, diminished in value is incorrect. They have increased immensely in value by reason of their neighborhood to numerous manufacturing towns and cities. Vegetables, small fruits, and such things are raised there and sold fresh in those towns.

The statement which the Senator is making, I understand he is merely quoting from other Senators.

Mr. DEPEW. Yes.

Mr. HOAR. The fact is that the farms which have diminished in value are what are called the hilltop farms, distant from villages.

Mr. DEPEW. I am very glad of that statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, and so I correct my statement as to the farm lands of Massachusetts having diminished in value in a hundred years.

Here is Massachusetts, which has no mines. I have just cited the case of Nevada, which has been almost constantly decreasing in population since the closing of the Comstock lode. Massachusetts, with agriculture, with manufactures, and with commerce, had a population—I am giving round numbers—of 523,000 in 1820; of 610,000 in 1830; of 737,000 in 1840; of 994,000 in 1850; of 1,231,000 in 1860; of 1,457,000 in 1870; of 1,783,000 in 1880; of 2,238,000 in 1890, and of 2,805,000 in 1900.

Take the two States which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BURTON] cited for illustration, West Virginia and Pennsylvania. If Pennsylvania had nothing but her coal mines, if she had no fertile soil, if she had no well-watered plains, if she had no vast manufacturing interests, made possible because of her agriculture, if she had no commerce—and commerce does not come from mines; it comes from agriculture and the products of agriculture and manufactures—Pennsylvania to-day would consist of settlements around the openings of her coal mines in the limited portion of her territory—of her anthracite and bituminous fields. Pennsylvania would be in the condition these Territories are in unless water can be found to irrigate them, and Pennsylvania, outside of the one county where her anthracite coal is and the ten counties where her bituminous coal exists, would be a desert. She would have no population and she would have no growth.

Mr. President, the point was made here, in his very eloquent and able speech, by my friend from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] that the internal-revenue receipts and the post-office receipts, coming from a State or Territory into the Treasury of the United States, were the measure of its prosperity and the hope for its future; and the Senator gave figures.

Arizona paid last year internal-revenue taxes amounting to $61,698.96; New Mexico, after sixty years of existence in the country and three hundred years of government, contributed last year in internal revenue to the Treasury of the United States the magnificent sum of $15,031.22. I emphasize the cents, Mr. President, because they are important in figures like these. [Laughter.] New York contributed——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURTON in the chair). Will the Senator from New York permit an interruption?

Mr. DEPEW. Yes, sir.

Mr. FORAKER. I have just come into the Chamber, and I understand the Senator has been quoting figures I gave when I was addressing the Senate on this subject.

Mr. DEPEW. I was quoting the figures given by the Senator as to the internal-revenue and post-office receipts.

Mr. FORAKER. Did the Senator state that I stated that the total receipts from internal revenue in the Territory of New Mexico for the last year were but fifteen thousand dollars and some cents?

Mr. DEPEW. No; I said the Senator gave the total for the two Territories, and then I found in the only statistics I could reach what were the returns for Arizona, and when I ascertained them, there was left but $15,031.22 for New Mexico.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator is entirely mistaken in making that statement. If I can find the place where I made that quotation, I will ask him to allow me to make a correction. I do not know how it comes that he has been misled as to what I said. I remember that I gave the respective internal-revenue receipts and the post-office receipts from New Mexico and from Arizona separately. I now turn to where I made the statement in my speech, and I find I stated that the internal-revenue receipts from New Mexico, as shown by the official statistics, were, in 1890, $37,671.19, and in 1901 the internal-revenue receipts from New Mexico amounted to $58,609.31.

I called attention, while making that statement, to the fact that the war taxes had doubtless increased the internal-revenue receipts for the last year, which I quoted, somewhat; and that that difference did not therefore represent the regular increase, and when I quoted the statistics in that respect as to Arizona I said that the internal-revenue receipts from Arizona in 1890 amounted to $28,416.06, and in 1902 to $129,267.95.

Mr. DEPEW. Those are post-office receipts.

Mr. FORAKER. I beg pardon; they are.

The internal-revenue receipts from Arizona for 1892 were $17,965.90, and for 1901 they were $61,698.96. And the internal-revenue receipts for New Mexico were not $15,000 for last year, but $58,609.31, as reported to me when these figures were taken from the census returns.

Mr. DEPEW. Well, Mr. President, accepting, as of course I accept, the figures of the Senator from Ohio, I will say that I got the figures which I quote from the compilation in the Eagle Almanac and the World Almanac, and I am using them both.

I find against $58,000, if you please, for New Mexico and $61,000 for Arizona, that here is Illinois with $54,000,000; Indiana with $25,000,000—and neither of these States has the age of settlement of New Mexico—Kentucky with $21,000,000—that is an old State—Pennsylvania with $32,000,000; Wisconsin with $10,000,000; California and Nevada—and of course California contributed the most of it—$3,785,000; and Connecticut and Rhode Island, $3,000,000. Even Hawaii has about $20,000 more than New Mexico, and $10,000 more than Arizona.

When you come to post-office receipts, which are in a measure an index of population, an index of the intelligence of a people, of their schools, their colleges, their commerce, and their internal trade, we find these astonishing results: The post-office receipts for Arizona for the year ending June 30, 1902, amounted to $129,267.95, and the post-office receipts for New Mexico for the same period amounted to $93,684.17.

I have here the post-office receipts of 51 cities of the United States, which run from $11,000,000 in New York to $218,000 in Racine, Wis.; $213,000 in Allegheny, Pa., and $314,000 in Syracuse, N. Y. In every one of these 51 cities the post-office receipts are larger than, in fact are more than double, those of New Mexico and nearly double those of Arizona.

But here is a significant comparison as to Oklahoma. We have, in making these figures, to return constantly to the years of settlement, and so I have to repeat that New Mexico has been in the Union sixty years and under Territorial government for fifty-one years, while Oklahoma has been only thirteen years open to settlement, and has had a Territorial government only about twelve years. With twelve years against sixty, the post-office receipts from social letters, commercial letters, trade letters, letters of activity, which make a State, were in New Mexico $93,000 and in Oklahoma $267,000, almost three times as much, and Oklahoma only twelve years in a Territorial condition.

For forty years Arizona has been exploiting her mines, having her cities increase 10,000 to 12,000 almost in a night and run down from 12,000 to 600 almost in a night. She has been for forty years open to the most favorable settlement, and exploited by the most enterprising people in the United States, and yet her post-office receipts last year were only $129,000 against Oklahoma's $267,000, after being only twelve years in a Territorial condition.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from New York permit an interruption?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I interrupt the Senator, if he is willing that I may, only to ask him a question as to whether or not the figures he gives as to Oklahoma show the receipts for any but the Presidential offices?

Mr. DEPEW. That is all I could get—the Presidential offices.

Mr. FORAKER. That is also true as to Arizona and New Mexico. The receipts are only those from Presidential offices. The fourth-class offices are not reported at all. That would swell the figures somewhat; but then the figures for Oklahoma would, I suppose, be correspondingly increased. I did not know what analysis the Senator had made of the figures.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The proportion would be maintained.

Mr. FORAKER. It would probably be maintained.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, in discussing a question I get somewhat off from my line of argument with these interruptions.

There is one point which has been dwelt upon here, which, in my studies, seems to me to grow in importance. It seems to me to indicate that there has been another hand in the preparation of this bill than the people who are interested in statehood. This bill received little or no consideration in the other House. It was prepared by the interests which wanted statehood given to these Territories immediately, whatever those interests were. It passed the House in that sort of general consideration which sends so much of undigested legislation to the Senate——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must remind the Senator that it is not in order to comment upon the action of the other House.

Mr. DEPEW. Am I commenting on the other House?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It so appeared to the Chair.

Mr. DEPEW. Well, I beg pardon. I was going to pay the House a compliment. I was going to remark in regard to the House that it passed an enormous amount of legislation, a prodigious amount of legislation, which it gets from its committees and passes to the Senate, such volumes of bills as to indicate on that side a vast capacity of statesmanship for construction on the spur of the moment. [Laughter.] I hope I am now within parliamentary lines. And in grasping these colonial, continental, internal, and external matters, it has prepared and sent to us this bill, as to which our Democratic friends will not permit us to add a dot, to cross a "t," or make any suggestions whatever.

The one question in which the good people of this country are more interested than in any other is Mormonism in the Territories which it is proposed to admit to statehood. It was supposed when the Edmunds bill passed, making it a felony to perform polygamous marriages or to live in a polygamous state, that the main prop was taken away from Mormonism, that the Mormon Church would gradually decay, and that it would die out with its professors of the hour. But the Mormon Church has increased enormously since that time—increased in numbers and in power. Mormon missionaries are all over the world. They are gathering recruits through the whole of the Scandinavian country, and are now successfully invading Germany and southern Europe. Nothing so illustrates the power of concentration or the ability of concentrated power as the history and the present dominance of the Mormon Church.

There are 7,000 Mormons in Arizona—one-twelfth of its white population—in other words, one in every twelve of its people is a Mormon.

The Democrats of Arizona, the Republicans of Arizona, the Populists or the Silverites of Arizona are moved according to the conscience and the judgment of the individual citizen. There are divisions between the two great parties and divisions in the minor organizations which are separate from or occasionally act with the two great parties; but here is a solid vote, controlled by one mind, controlled by one hand. The spiritual adviser, who is also the spiritual and the temporal guide of this Mormon population, looks not to the interests of this party or to the welfare of that party, but he says to the Democratic leader, "What will you do in protecting Mormonism?" and to the Republican leader, "What will you do in protecting Mormonism?" We all know that if there is any fallibility in the world it is the judgment at election time of the political leader of any party.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from New York permit an interruption?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator from New York suggested that the Mormon Church, through its apostles or leaders, propounds to the Republican party the question, "What will it do to protect Mormonism?" and to the Democratic party, "What will it do to protect Mormonism?" I want to ask the Senator from New York, if that is true, whether or not the Republican party did not make the highest bid two years ago and pledge itself to do more to protect Mormonism than did the Democratic party? If what the Senator says is true, then the Republican party got only what it bargained for two years ago.

Mr. DEPEW. The answer to that Mr. President, is that both parties probably made every bid that was possible, but the Mormons trusted the Republicans. [Laughter.] Then the Mormon leader, the shrewdest and most capable of leaders, knew that in the trend of civilization, in the spread of colleges and schools, and in the growth of education, the Republican party was likely to grow and the Democratic party otherwise; and that he had better make his bargain on that side, as there would be more permanence to it.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from New York permit an interruption?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I do not know how true the reports of this bargain may be, but out in our country two years ago there was a common report, which was generally believed, that a bargain to the following import and the following effect was made: That the leading Mormon apostles came East and had an interview with the high officers of the Republican party two years ago. At that time a gentleman by the name of Smoot spoke about being a candidate for the United States Senate. As a result of the visit it was suggested, "Turn Utah over to the Republicans, recede from your silver heresies, come into the Republican fold, let Mr. Smoot ignore his ambitions this year, and several things will occur. First, we will give you a Mormon for governor." If that was the bargain, it was carried out, because they have got a Mormon for governor.

Mr. SPOONER. They have a majority, have they not?

Mr. PATTERSON. Next, Mr. Smoot did retire from the field, but became a candidate this year in accordance with the programme, and he has been elected to the United States Senate. Next, that there was some understanding or agreement that the Republican majority of the Senate was to see to it that no antipolygamy amendment to the Constitution was proposed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Was Mr. Smoot one of the parties to the agreement?

Mr. PATTERSON. It is said that Mr. Smoot was one of them.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. With whom did the Mormon leaders make the agreement?

Mr. PATTERSON. Oh, I do not want to mention names. You know who the high officials of the Republican party are.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Who are the high officials of whom you speak?

Mr. PATTERSON. I prefer not to mention names, Mr. President. Whether the agreement was made or not, we know that the promises upon the part of the Republican leaders up to this time have been faithfully carried out. Whether they will be carried out in the next session of Congress of course remains to be seen when the credentials of the newly elected Senator from Utah will be presented. We know that Utah immediately reversed its very great anti-Republican majority and came pell mell—horse, foot, and dragoons—over into the Republican fold.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, upon that very point I wish to say that if there was any bargain I do not know anything about it. The details of it have been revealed to the Senator from Colorado, but I was in New York at the time and was not taken into the inner council, if there was an inner council, or into the consultation, if there was a consultation; but I call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the fact that this bill has nothing in it to prohibit polygamy in these Territories when they are admitted as States. It has been demonstrated here that the clause which is pretended to accomplish the purpose of prohibiting polygamous marriage and polygamous living to be put into the constitutions of these States is a sham. It has been shown here that under this provision in these constitutions polygamous marriages can take place and there can be no punishment.

Now, notwithstanding that that has been shown, there has been no proposition from any Democratic Senator or any Democratic source that under any circumstances the antipolygamous provision shall be strengthened. On the contrary, when that subject was under discussion here a few days ago, my friend the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], instead of saying "Yes, I want the provision in regard to polygamy made just as strong as human language can draw it," said there was no need of such a provision, because, if I remember him rightly, the antipolygamous people of those States would never permit this institution to flourish after the State was admitted into the Union.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from New York allow a suggestion?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from New York and his friends will fix a day when we can vote on the bill we will all agree to join him in strengthening the antipolygamy provision.

[At this point Mr. DEPEW yielded the floor for the day.]

Friday, February 13, 1903.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, when I was interrupted by a motion for an executive session, I was discussing the question of Mormonism in its relation to the pending statehood bill. I was saying that the statehood bill had made no provision which was effective in the requirement which it exacted from these proposed States when they came into the Union in reference to the prevention of polygamy and polygamous marriages. It seems from the character of this provision and from the facts that it failed utterly to meet the case, that the fine Italian hand of the Mormon apostles had been at work in the preparation of the measure, and that the influence, the concentrated influence, of the Mormon hierarchy could be seen in the determined effort to prevent any amendment which would perfect completely the exclusion of polygamy in the constitutions of these three proposed States.

Under those circumstances, Mr. President, it becomes exceedingly interesting to ascertain what is the attitude of the Mormon Church and what is its influence wherever it has numbers which it can vote.

Senators upon the other side claim that there is no necessity to limit in those constitutions the power of the States which are to come into the Union to deal with this question. They claim that the sentiment in those States, without any provisions being placed in their constitutions by act of Congress, would be all powerful to enact such laws as would prevent polygamy or polygamous marriages in these various States.

Mr. President, in the Territory of Arizona at present one-twelfth of the population is attached to the Mormon Church. If we could carry that number into the State of New York, it would constitute 600,000 people in that State who would belong to and be under the control of the Mormon Church.

It is not disputed by anyone that the votes of the members of the Mormon Church are absolutely controlled by the central hierarchy of that organization. I want to say that in the close politics of the State of New York, if there were 600,000 of that population, representing something over 100,000 votes, as it would, which could be controlled by one mind, by one purpose, appealing first to this party and then to that, they would be enabled to exact terms from both parties for their own protection, for such legislation as they wanted and for the prohibition of such legislation as they did not desire. Everyone knows how in the election of members of a legislature, if there is a solid body of votes sufficient to control a district, both parties are willing to pledge their candidates to that vote for whatever that vote desires.

I have here an address delivered on the fiftieth year of Mormonism, in 1880, by the ablest and most eloquent bishop of that church. It was delivered at a great convention held at Salt Lake City for the purpose of celebrating the triumph of Mormonism, its past, its then present, and its future. The bishop said:

Like a grain of mustard seed was the truth planted in Zion; and it is destined to spread through all the world. Our church has been organized only fifty years, and yet behold its wealth and power. This is our year of jubilee. We look forward with perfect confidence to the day when we will hold the reins of the United States Government. That is our present temporal aim; after that we expect to control the Continent.

When told that such a scheme seemed rather visionary, in view of the fact that Utah could not gain recognition as a State, Bishop Lunt replied:

Do not be deceived; we are looking after that.

We intend to have Utah recognized as a State. To-day we hold the balance of political power in Idaho, we rule Utah absolutely, and in a very short time we will hold the balance of power in Arizona and Wyoming. A few months ago President Snow, of St. George, set out with a band of priests for an extensive tour through Colorado, New Mexico, Wyoming, Montana, Idaho, and Arizona to proselyte. We also expect to send missionaries to some parts of Nevada, and we design to plant colonies in Washington Territory.

In the past six months—

And remember this was twenty-two years ago—

We have sent—

I call attention to that. I call attention to the fact that these are not voluntary immigrants. I call attention to the fact that these are not colonists moving, as they do in those Western States, in prairie schooners from the farmhouses to settle for themselves after they have found a proper location, but that they are sent by the church in those large and compact bodies—not colonists primarily, not to secure farms primarily, not to make a living, for they have a living already and already have farms, but in order to colonize their followers in sufficient numbers and in sufficiently compact bodies to control the legislation of the Territory. So I repeat from the bishop's sermon:

In the past six months we have sent more than 3,000 of our people down through the Sevier Valley to settle in Arizona, and the movement still progresses. All this will build up for us a political power, which will in time compel the homage of the demagogues of the country. Our vote is solid, and will remain so. It will be thrown where the most good will be accomplished for the church. Then, in some political crisis, the two present political parties will bid for our support. Utah will then be admitted as a polygamous State, and the other Territories we have peacefully subjugated will be admitted also. We will then hold the balance of power, and will dictate to the country. In time our principles, which are of sacred origin, will spread throughout the United States. We possess the ability to turn the political scale in any particular community we desire. Our people are obedient. When they are called by the church they promptly obey. They sell their houses, lands, and stock, and remove to any part of the country the church may direct them to. You can imagine the results which wisdom may bring about with the assistance of a church organization like ours.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. RAWLINS. Can the Senator give me the name of the author of the address from which he has been reading?

Mr. DEPEW. Bishop Lunt.

Mr. RAWLINS. Can the Senator inform me at what place that sermon was supposed to have been delivered?

Mr. DEPEW. According to this pamphlet, it was delivered to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary, the jubilee, of Mormonism.

Mr. RAWLINS. At what place?

Mr. DEPEW. The pamphlet does not state at what place.

Mr. RAWLINS. I think it is but fair to the Senator to say that that address is in its authorship fictitious; that there is, I think, no bishop of that name in the Mormon Church; certainly none that I ever heard of. But I have heard before of the address, and I am quite sure it is fictitious because it describes a condition which is impossible. No Mormon bishop would talk about sending 3,000 colonists through the Sevier Valley into Arizona, because it is a route that is utterly impossible. Besides, I am quite sure that is a fictitious address prepared by some one to disclose his idea of the purposes of the Mormon Church. I think the Senator has been imposed upon; and I thought it but just to call his attention to that fact.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, I would not under any circumstances quote from a sermon which I did not believe had been delivered, or state beliefs of the Mormon Church which I did not suppose were its beliefs.

This pamphlet has been gotten out by the League for Social Service, of New York, under the sign manual and responsibility of Rev. Josiah Strong, D. D., one of the ablest clergymen of the Presbyterian Church, and the author of two books, one of them called "Our Country," and the other "The New Era;" which are amongst the most valuable contributions to the statistics which mark the growth and progress of the United States.

Mr. RAWLINS. I have not any doubt of the belief of the Senator that he was reading an address which had actually been delivered by some prominent Mormon official, but the prominent churchmen in the Mormon Church are the president of the church, two councillors, and the quorum of twelve apostles. The bishops are really subordinate officers, having jurisdiction only in small localities—wards. The occasion which is described there would have given the matter such prominence that if such an address had been delivered I am sure we would have heard of it. Besides, that has been——

Mr. DEPEW. Twenty-two years ago.

Mr. RAWLINS. I know that address has been repudiated years ago; and I do not think any non-Mormon familiar with the situation, however much he may be opposed to the purposes of the Mormon Church politically or otherwise, would be willing to ascribe that to them.

Mr. DEPEW. I should like to ask the Senator whether, in his opinion, the Mormon Church would repudiate what the bishop is here alleged to have said?

Mr. RAWLINS. The Mormon Church organ has, I think, repudiated that sermon and the correctness of its statements. Of course, some prominent Mormon leaders have given expression to the idea that theirs was to become the paramount church, and things of that sort; but I think some individual has prepared that address as exemplifying what he conceived to be the purposes of the Mormon Church.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Utah permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. RAWLINS. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I know nothing about the authenticity of this sermon, nor do I know about the facts which the sermon itself assumes to state, but I ask the Senator from Utah—he is, perhaps, better informed in regard to this subject than any of us, because he lives so close to the Mormon people—what he has to say about the facts given in the sermon itself? Of course the sermon is of no consequence, except as it does state or does not state actual conditions. Now, what is the fact about the actual conditions? What is the fact about the propaganda? What is the fact about the colonization? What is the fact about all those things which the sermon itself assumes to state as facts? I ask the Senator for information.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, the Senator is endeavoring to cast a burden upon me which I do not feel myself able to sustain.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not know the facts myself, and I should like to know from the Senator what the facts are.

Mr. RAWLINS. Those statements cover a multitude of things. It would be best to get information in regard to these matters from the standard works of doctrine of the Mormon Church. They have certain books of doctrine and covenants, and in those books will be found what they claim to be the correct statement and enunciation of the tenets and doctrines and purposes of the Mormon Church. I am not sufficiently familiar with them to answer the inquiry of the Senator from Indiana. As to any material condition in Utah, if that were relevant at this time, I should be glad to give my own views upon it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will call the Senator's attention to the fact that in that sermon the bishop states some alleged facts about the propaganda of Mormonism, the colonization of Mormonism in Arizona, and other facts outside of his own opinion. Of course, Mr. President, the sermon itself, even if it were authentic, would not be of any consequence if it did not state the facts—if it was merely the extravagant expression of some religious enthusiast; but even if it were not that, and nevertheless did state the facts, that would be the chief thing. Now, what I was asking the Senator was, from his observation—his opportunity for observation being nearer than ours—what his information was as to those facts, as to Arizona, for instance.

Mr. RAWLINS. As to the matter of colonization?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; and all the other things, the series of facts stated there.

Mr. RAWLINS. As to colonization, the Mormon Church since its foundation has sent out a great many missionaries in different countries for proselyting and making converts. Those converts were invited to gather in Utah.

As people came in it was the policy of Brigham Young, during his leadership of the church, to find homes for them.

As the lands in Utah subject to reclamation became occupied, the members of the Mormon Church decided to find homes for the surplus population. The people went out into Wyoming, and some prominent man in the church would be designated to go along with them. The church organization would follow the Mormons, and the church form of government would prevail in the new colony. So they went into Idaho; so they have gone down into Arizona. They have also gone into the Republic of Mexico. There are some up in Oregon. They are finding homes generally. But whatever may be the dream of some leader of the Mormon Church about political power, the main purpose of establishing these people in colonies in different places is to provide homes for them, and I do not think any prominent churchman would give expression to the thoughts which are contained in that supposed address from Bishop Lunt.

I have already stated the influence of the leaders over the Mormon people growing out of the original condition in which they were found. Some of the leaders are disposed to exercise their power in political affairs. There is an increasing number of Mormons, however, who claim their independence in political matters, who resent such interference and who will not obey the dictates of the leaders. Many Republicans, if they were told by their leading churchmen to vote the Democratic ticket, would not do it, and many Democrats, if told to vote the Republican ticket, would not do it.

Many others who have been in the habit of taking counsel upon various matters, feeling in a degree dependent upon the church leaders—their organization being a sort of religious paternal government in the past—would do it. Their influence in the way of controlling elections, where elections are close between the parties, is very great.

The conditions will be the same in Arizona that they are now in Wyoming. The Senators from Wyoming know whether or not Wyoming ought or ought not to be in the Union by reason of that condition. I take it that everybody in Wyoming would say that they preferred to be a State with a considerable percentage of Mormon population there than to be in the condition of a Territory.

All we could do in this connection in regard to any provision in the constitution of a State forbidding polygamy, regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors, or making any domestic State regulation would be futile, unless approved by a prevailing public sentiment in that State which would demand its enforcement. You may put a provision upon the statutes or you may put it in the constitution of a State, and if the sentiment of the people is against its enforcement it will be a dead letter.

When this question came up in the other House my position there was this: I said, if it is necessary to put a provision in the constitution of the State of Utah providing for the punishment of polygamy, Utah is not prepared for statehood, because such a provision will be idle unless the sentiment of the community is such as to put it into effect. If the sentiment in the State is in favor of the suppression of polygamy it will be suppressed by the State law without any reference to the State constitution. If the sentiment is in favor of the establishment of polygamy a prohibitory provision in the constitution is nugatory and idle. It is simply making a declaration which is of no value upon the fundamental law, which is merely declaratory, if it has any effect at all, of the unfitness of the people for admission into the Union. It does not reach the evils which are complained of. It is not, in my judgment, at this time, a question of polygamy.

In talking about the inadequacy of the provisions in this proposed statehood bill, the question of the exercise of political power is a question which you can not very well reach. Of course you might say that no member of any church which claims the right to dictate to its people how they shall vote or what they shall do in matters of state shall be permitted to vote or to hold office; but the adequacy of such a provision to correct an evil of this kind is doubtful.

It seems to me that what you must in the end rely upon is the American sentiment. The spirit of the American people, which has created and preserved our free institutions, will prevail, and the hierarchy and its rule must succumb in the presence of that sentiment everywhere in every locality in this country. I think that is the true remedy.

When you assail any church you solidify its membership. Let the people go out and undertake the exercise of the privileges of government, the right to vote and to hold office, giving rise to the various contentions and claims and arguments which are made in that respect, speakers making one claim or another going to advocate their doctrine, and in the end such a people will not be the slaves of any hierarchy. They will be independent people. If not so now, their children will be.

Utah has had troubles, and will continue to have some trouble on account of this church; but what are we going to do about it? It does not do any good, in my judgment, to stand here and arraign the entire people, to brand every Mormon as a slave, for that is an unjust accusation. When you do that, you solidify those who would aid you in bringing about the very condition which you desire to see established. Whenever external force is employed against a people, arraigning them, their church, and their faith, it solidifies them, and you are unable to make any impression upon them whatsover.

You have no basis upon which to appeal to them. They look upon your action as persecution. Instead of promoting the end you have in view you accomplish the very opposite. Persecution is the seed of the church. Some apostle or some president of the church or some bishop may go out and say to his followers, "Now, you vote this ticket or that ticket." To-day in Utah he does it, and denies that he does it. He does it with the disapproval of the sentiment of the community. When it is brought to light and he is arraigned about it, he seeks to evade responsibility. That of itself is evidence of a vastly improving condition in that State.

I want to say here of American communities, in every locality of this country inhabited by the Anglo-Saxon race or the Scandinavian race, or the German race, however strong may be their religious ties, their devotion to their country in the end will make them good citizens. And when you have, notwithstanding what you may be pleased to call their fanaticism, an otherwise honest, frugal, and industrious people, who maintain economical and honest government, you need to have only a little patience and in the end your patience will bear fruit, especially if political leaders offer no inducements to prominent churchmen to interfere.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Utah pardon me? Would the Senator suggest, along that line of argument, that nothing at all should be put in the enabling act concerning polygamy if it were futile?

Mr. RAWLINS. That was my precise contention in the House ten years ago when the question came up as to the insertion of a provision in the constitution. I said then that the provision which was inserted as I remember on motion of Judge Powers of Vermont, that polygamous and plural marriages should be forbidden, was absolutely useless and idle; that if the public sentiment in Utah was not in favor of the suppression of polygamy, that that provision would not lead to its suppression; that if the public sentiment was in favor of affording protection to those who became polygamists or lived in unlawful cohabitation, that provision would have no terror for them; and that after all, whatever you might put in the State constitution, you would have to rely upon the public sentiment in the local community for its enforcement, and if it was in favor of the suppression of polygamy the legislature would provide laws against it and those laws would be enforced and such a provision in the constitution would be unnecessary.

So, I say now, in regard to Arizona. If you insert such a clause as is now in, or if you enact a penal code, if you please, containing all the necessary qualifications and exceptions to define the offense, and make it self-executing, so far as the provisions of the constitution are concerned, what does it amount to if the Mormons are in control and they are determined to have polygamy and elect the prosecuting officers and the judges, and sit upon the grand jury and the petit jury. If you are going to have a provision which will be of any effect to you at all, you will have to go further than any Senator has proposed.

You will have to define polygamy and all its kindred offenses as you would define them in a penal code. You will have to provide some method by which no person favoring the inhibited practice shall sit upon grand or petty juries or be elected to the bench or be elected to the office of prosecuting attorney. You can not do that. It comes back to the original proposition: Are these people fit to be admitted into the Union as a State? If so, why insert anything which on its face brands them as unfit and yet which will be futile so far as accomplishing any good is concerned?

I stand to-day just as I stood in the House of Representatives when I said, in substance: "The provision you offer here, in my opinion, is useless. I will not concede it is necessary, because to do so would be to concede Utah to be unfit to be admitted into the Union. I prefer to have the State come in with a clean bill, just as every other State has. I am advocating the admission of Utah upon the theory that if you emancipate these people from outside interference, the spirit of American institutions will be evolved in their midst and will assert itself and overthrow everything antagonistic to the spirit of our institutions. And if that is not true, we are unfit to be admitted into the Union." I say the same with respect to New Mexico and Arizona.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I think this discussion is unfortunate. Much is said about the Declaration of Independence. It has been regarded as a great step in human progress. I think that other declaration, in the Constitution of the United States, which guarantees to every citizen of the United States the right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, is, if possible, more important than any declaration which preceded it.

The circumstances which brought about that declaration were peculiar. The different colonies which settled along the Atlantic border were composed, as a rule, of devoted followers of a particular creed or church. They differed from each other. It prevented for a long time their social intercourse. Even criminal proceedings were instituted by one colony against the inhabitants of another. This went on for generations, until finally the oppressions of Great Britain were such that the colonies were compelled to unite in self-defense. Their union was mostly commercial. Nothing was said about religion. But they united for commercial purposes, and they fought a great war, and when the war was over it was perfectly obvious to everyone that the union must continue or the results of the war would fail.

When they came together, they found it necessary to compromise, and each colony refrained from putting its creed into the Constitution. They had to give that up. And from that resulted that noble principle which had affected mankind everywhere, that every individual in a free government is entitled to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience. I believe that principle, as enunciated in our Constitution, has had more to do with the advance of civilization than any other declaration that ever emanated from any other body of men under any circumstances.

Now, we have had all during my recollection men of different denominations demanding everything for themselves. They want to rule the whole earth. But here everybody is free to exercise his own judgment, and they find it impossible. The discussion that has grown up under this freedom has brought forth intelligence and enlightenment such as the world has never known, and not only in our country, but it has spread throughout the world.

Here is the Mormon Church. Its founders constituted a devoted band. I have been familiar with them for more than fifty years. I have visited repeatedly in their homes. I have traveled through their territory. Whatever may be said of them, they live more closely to their own creed and their own ideas of morality and maintain them with more rigidity than almost any other people I ever saw. As they understand morality, they have always been moral.

But polygamy is in conflict with the moral sentiment of the people of the United States. It is in conflict with the whole system of Christian religion. It is Asiatic in fact, and the American people rose against it, and for a time the Mormons struggled for it. Finally, as they came in contact with the outside world and the principles of religion were discussed freely between them and their adversaries, this idea of the freedom of discussson and the freedom of religion penetrated the Mormon church and revolutionized it, so far as polygamy was concerned; at all events, its practice. The mormons of Utah agreed to give up polygamy and come in and adopt the institutions of the country as others had done.

Utah was admitted into the Union some years ago. No attempt has been made to pass a law to reestablish polygamy. A man who would propose that in the legislature of Utah would be laughed at as a fool or would be taken to an insane asylum. Polygamy is a thing of the past. Public sentiment, under the principle of free discussion, has condemned that part of the creed of the Mormon Church.

But that is not all of their religion. They have their own religious sentiments. They have their own creed, which they observe and believe in as fervently as do the adherents of any other church. They attend divine services regularly. They have their Sunday schools. They have their means of disseminating religious information, and they have dropped the one thing that the American people condemned as immoral.

The moral sense of the Mormon people has been convinced, and they are not practicing polygamy. If it is practiced at all, it is done in secret, as other crimes are committed in secret. No man in that country proclaims it. If he does he is condemned. A Mormon came to represent Utah in the other House of Congress, and the sentiment of the American people was such that he was not allowed to take his seat. There is no foundation for the belief that they should go back now. As the young men and young women are growing up and marrying, no plural marriages are being had and public sentiment against polygamy is being formed there as impregnably as it is in Massachusetts. It needs no further action. It is a thing of the past.

I regret that such a question should be discussed here; that religion should be brought into this discussion. It has nothing to do with polygamy. I regret that sectarianism has been dragged into the question of admitting a State into the Union. It seems to me it is wrong in this body. We ought to be above such considerations.

As for Arizona and New Mexico, there are a few Mormons there. Someone has said that the Mormons constitute as large a proportion as one-sixth of the population in Arizona. They are not practising polygamy there. Polygamous marriages are illegal in that Territory. They are criminal in those Territories, made so by the action of the legislatures, and nobody proposes otherwise and nobody ever will propose otherwise.

It is unfair to make an attack upon Mormonism now, when the feature of Mormonism which we had a right to condemn has been eliminated. We have no right, in our capacity as legislators, to condemn any other feature of the Mormon religion, or any feature of any other religion, which is moral and teaches good moral principles. We may differ with their creed, but we are bound under the Constitution to recognize their right to that creed, no matter how absurd we may regard it. It is nothing to be considered here. The Constitution has placed that elsewhere. It has given them the privilege in express terms, and we can not take it from them, if we would.

The idea of saying that a people having in their midst one-tenth or one-twelfth Mormons, who are not practicing polygamy, will be corrupted and that polygamy will be introduced, when in Utah itself there is no possibility that polygamy can ever again be introduced by law, when the sentiment against it is growing stronger and stronger, and the whole American people have come to the conclusion that it can never be, and we know it can never be! Why keep people out of the Union on the theory that it is possible for a few Mormons in Arizona to take charge of it, run the State, and, running it, run the Union, and, running the Union, run the world? What nonsense it is to be indulging in such talk as that!

I have no objection to speeches against admitting these Territories. I know there is a very strong sentiment here against it. I have sat here day after day and heard arguments to show that these Territories are worthless; that the land is worthless; that they have no resources. That is the old thing. If you will go back in history you will find that the same was said of everything west of the Mississippi. The most eminent men of this country denounced Oregon as worthless. They denounced California as worthless. They denounced New Mexico as worthless. They denounced Texas as worthless. In fact, everything in the West in its time has been regarded as worthless. But there is no part of the United States with a hundred thousand square miles that is not capable of supporting a great State which shall strengthen the Union and be the pride of the nation. Do not think it is worthless.

Since I have been in the Senate I have heard eminent men before committees state that it would be a good thing to give all of this territory back to Mexico; that it was good for nothing. That included even Nebraska, the Dakotas, and Oklahoma, and all the territory clear to the Pacific. Now we see Colorado, we see Nebraska, we see these great States there adding to our wealth and power. Fourth of July orators, even in Massachusetts or anywhere else where you may find them, point with pride to the great progress that this country has made by bringing in new States. They point to the power which the new States have added to the country. If you do that before a Fourth of July audience, why not do it as American statesmen? Why should we not be proud of the growth of the country?

Senators talk of Nevada. Nevada needs no defense. Nevada has added more to the commerce of the country than any of the Western States, except perhaps California. Colorado perhaps comes next. Nevada has produced about eight hundred millions of gold and silver. She has taken from the Government nothing. She has been no expense and no drawback. She has paid her own expenses. But her progress has been slow. The reasons for it are obvious. Agriculture could be conducted only by irrigation, and the various beautiful valleys over the State were a long distance from transportation. The main industry—mining—was cut down by the demonetization of silver. It took time to build up Nevada. Thank God, it is being built up rapidly now. Every valley is being invaded by hardy settlers. New mines are being opened everywhere, and there is more agricultural land in Nevada which will be developed and make homes for men than there is in very many States of this Union. I can name several States combined which would not begin to have as much.

Now, of course, you must wait a little for it. Nevada did not ask to be admitted into the Union. You can not blame her people. It is not fair to talk about her in that way. A year before her admission the legislature authorized a vote to be taken on the question whether we would come into the Union as a State. It was voted down almost unanimously.

Nevada would have stayed out until now if it had not been brought in by the invitation of this Government. When an enabling act was passed here it did not meet with any favor in Nevada. I was there at the time. It did not meet with favor until the word came that they wanted Nevada as a State for legislative purposes, that they wanted it for the purpose of reconstruction, that they wanted it as a patriotic contribution to the Union. Then it went unanimously, and Nevada came in. And coming in, it has paid its own expenses and been, I hope, no discredit to the Government. Now it is on the road to development, and the days are not far distant when it will be one of the bright stars in the galaxy of States.

I can show you any amount of literature presented to show that Oregon was worthless, that California was worthless, and that all the territory in the Great American Desert was worthless. Yet here you have Montana and the Dakotas; you have Colorado, Wyoming, and Utah, as great and rich States.

Now, there is another thing about the people of Utah. I do not want to sit down until I have borne my testimony to the great good that they have done to this country. Those people went to Utah on account of their religion. They went to a country where irrigation was not known. The Anglo-Saxon had never prosecuted agriculture by irrigation. It never had been done. We came from a country where we relied only on rainfall. The Mormons went to that great desert region and they suffered hardships which can scarcely be described until they worked out the experiment of raising crops by means of irrigation.

I was at an irrigation convention at Salt Lake City some ten or twelve years ago, and President Woodruff and Mr. Cannon stood in the rear of the audience, and without consulting the audience I announced that it was the unanimous desire that they should be heard. I did not put it to a vote because everybody was against Mormonism. It was a Gentile convention, composed of a thousand or fifteen hundred people. I brought those gentlemen right forward, and the story those two old men told of the inauguration of irrigation and the hardships they endured brought tears to the eyes of more than half the audience, and when they were through it was necessary to adjourn, and the audience asked to shake hands with them. The old gentlemen told me that was the entering wedge which brought communication between them and the Gentiles.

This friendship and communication has banished polygamy. Those people by their industry and economy have built a great State in what was denounced as a desert. It has enabled those people to enjoy the blessings of free government and enabled the people of the United States to enjoy the fruits of a great industrial people in the heart of the desert. That has shown to the world what can be done.

Out of it have grown other States, and it has demonstrated to the country that what was thought to be worthless, what was marked on the map as the Great American Desert, is the great American garden, the great garden of the world, in mines and in agriculture and in everything that contributes to the wealth and growth and development of man.

Now, why speak of those people as if they had committed some crime? If they had not given up polygamy, it would be different. But in this question of States, why bring them in collaterally and discuss their conduct? Outside of polygamy, they compare favorably with the conduct of the Puritans or any other people who ever landed upon these shores. If you go and see their homes, see their thrift, see their industry, see their domestic happiness, you will not have it in your heart to raise your hand or your voice against them.

The continuance of polygamy was impossible, and I am thankful that it was destroyed. It can not be revived. It is dead and buried. It never can be resurrected in this country. Any attempt of any foolhardy man to advocate it will be as futile as it would be to the descendants of the Puritans to advocate trial for witchcraft. It would be just as foolish, for polygamy is as dead as witchcraft.

But it has not killed the energies of the Mormon people any more than witchcraft killed the energies of New England and prevented its growth. The industrious people who came there built up New England, and they have gone on, and they are now among the most enlightened people on earth. So it is coming to pass in Utah. They educate their young men and their young women, and when they come here they are able to cope with the brightest young men and women in all the United States. Do not speak ill of them. They do not deserve it. It will not do any good to denounce them in this debate. It will not do any good to exclude Arizona on that account.

If you do not want to admit Arizona, vote against the admission of Arizona. Do not pretend that Arizona is a worthless desert, for it is not true. Do not pretend that Arizona has institutions inimical to the United States, because it is not true. Stick to the truth. Arizona has the resources to make a great State. The waters of the Gila and its branches are sufficient to irrigate the land and produce more than all New England. It has been a magnificent country and it has been once occupied. It is covered with ruins.

Somebody once irrigated a large portion of it. It is ready for occupancy again. We have a report to the effect that the Colorado River can be made to irrigate a large portion of it. Do you not believe that those things will be done, considering the fine climate Arizona enjoys, and when fruits can be produced at least two weeks and perhaps thirty days earlier than in California, and of a better quality? Do you think that such resources will remain untouched for a long time with the population pressing on? Of course not.

When you come to New Mexico, you have no conception of what may be done in that vast country when the waters are conserved, as they will be. If this rule had been applied to the other States in the beginning, if you had harked about their religion, if you had harked about their resources, you might have kept them all out and remained a little bunch of States on the Atlantic coast.

New York ought not to lift her voice against it. New York has been foremost in promoting the progress of the West. New York ought not to be now discussing the dead carcass of polygamy on a question of this kind or quoting from some imaginary or extravagant missionary some ideas of governing the world which are impossible and irrational. There are plenty of irrational people all over the country, but the great body of the American people are sane and sound and patriotic, and it is they who make this country great.

I hope this debate will take a higher plane and regard the rights of man more thoroughly than it has done. I tell you that living in a Territorial government is not a desirable thing. The right of self-government is dear to the American people. Do you say that you can appoint better judges and better governors and better officers than they can select? When and where did you find that you could do that? Did you do it in the Dakotas? Have they not better courts and better officers now than they had in Territorial times? Did you do it in Montana? Do they not have a better observance and enforcement of law and a more contented people than they had in Territorial times previous to their admission? Did you do it in Washington, or Oregon, or Idaho, or Nevada? Did you do it in any one place? Has not every new State which has been admitted proved the advantage to the people and the country of extending to them the right of self-government?

In Utah you had your prosecuting attorneys and you were greatly troubled about polygamy. You have admitted Utah as a State, and the trouble is over. So it will be when you give the American people the right of self-government under the Declaration of Independence and under that higher declaration which allows every man to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience. It has inspired a sentiment in this country that will prevent any injurious element from entering into the government of the people. Crime will be reprobated and driven to hide its head and truth, justice, and progress will prevail. The time is not far distant when these Territories that you so much condemn to-day will be proud States. You yourselves will live long enough to boast of them on the Fourth of July. There is no doubt about it, particularly the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], as he is in the habit of making Fourth of July orations.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. DUBOIS. I will not interrupt the Senator unless he is entirely satisfied to have me do so.

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. DUBOIS. I will not take very much time.

Mr. DEPEW. I have become accustomed to it.

Mr. DUBOIS. I repeat my observation, with entire sincerity, that I will not interrupt the Senator unless it is agreeable to him.

Mr. DEPEW. It is entirely agreeable. The Senator comes from a college that makes it agreeable.

Mr. DUBOIS. Thank you.

I doubt very much whether gentlemen on the other side who are proposing some special legislation in regard to polygamy are serious. I do not think they are. I think they are simply trying to put some amendments on this bill which may defeat it.

Now, I will make this proposition to them: If you will allow this bill to be put on the post-office appropriation bill, I will accept the Idaho constitution relating to elections as an amendment, and allow you to prescribe that Arizona and New Mexico shall put into their constitutions the test oath of Idaho before they are admitted to statehood. In doing this I will not run counter to the good judgment or the wishes of the people of Idaho, one-fourth of whom are Mormons.

In order that you may know what it is, I will read that portion of the Idaho constitution which is called the Idaho test oath. It has been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States and found to be a valid law by a unanimous decision of that court. It is now a part of the constitution of the State of Idaho. They have the ordinary clauses in regard to the restriction of the franchise, but they say in addition:

SEC. 3. No person is permitted to vote, serve as a juror, or to hold any civil office who is under guardianship, idiotic, or insane; or who has, at any place, been convicted of treason, felony, embezzlement of the public funds, bartering or selling or offering to barter or sell his vote, or purchasing or offering to purchase the vote of another, or other infamous crime, and who has not been restored to the rights of citizenship; or who, at the time of such election, is confined in prison on conviction of a criminal offense; or who is a bigamist or polygamist or is living in what is known as patriarchal, plural, or celestial marriage, or in violation of any law of this State or of the United States forbidding any such crime; or who in any manner teaches, advises, counsels, aids, or encourages any person to enter into bigamy, polygamy, or such patriarchal, plural, or celestial marriage, or to live in violation of any such law, or to commit any such crime; or who is a member of or contributes to the support, aid, or encouragement of any order, organization, association, corporation, or society which teaches, advises, counsels, encourages, or aids any person to enter into bigamy, polygamy, or such patriarchal or plural marriage, or which teaches or advises that the laws of this State prescribing rules of civil conduct are not the supreme law of the State.

Not content with that very sweeping prescription, we passed this section as section 4, fearing that we had left out something. I was in the midst of that fight. This constitution was passed without a dissenting voice in our constitutional convention. We had this question at home with us in those days. After putting in all those prescriptions, thinking perhaps we might have overlooked something, we also added this clause:

SEC. 4. The legislature may prescribe qualifications, limitations, and conditions for the right of suffrage additional to those prescribed in this article, but shall never annul any of the provisions in this article contained.

We can add to that if we want to do so, and pass a law forbidding the Mormon leaders from actively taking part in politics.

Now, if the Senators on the other side will allow this bill to be put on the post-office appropriation bill, I will consent and advocate that it shall be required that Arizona and New Mexico shall put that clause in their constitutions before they are admitted, and under that clause we disfranchised every member of the Mormon Church. They did not vote for years in Idaho under that constitution, and at any time that we want to we can disqualify them now. All we have to do is to say that no Mormon shall vote in Idaho; and the Supreme Court of the United States has declared that to be good law. We have a right to do it.

I say there is no polygamy, and no one contended more vigorously against this tenet and practice of the Mormon Church than myself. It was a fierce fight for years, and in my feeble way I did all I could to suppress it, and this helped us to do it.

It is folly and a waste of time for Senators to undertake to demonstrate here now that polygamy is a live issue. It is dead, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] so well said, and he has spent his life among these people, fighting them hand to hand. If any have suffered on account of their activity in politics the Senator from Utah is one of them; but, as he says, polygamy is not a living issue. It is dead because of the public sentiment in that country, which has destroyed it.

Now, these Mormon people believe what no other people do, and they are as sincere in that as they are in their other beliefs. They believe that the Constitution of the United States is a divine instrument. They honestly and thoroughly believe that it comes direct from God. In the early days they believed that under the Constitution the United States could not interfere with polygamy, holding to the idea that polygamy was a part of their religion. They contended that the Constitution, being a divine instrument, and polygamy being a part of their religion, it could not be interfered with under our Constitution.

I may say that they fought against antipolygamy laws in all the courts, but when the Supreme Court of the United States declared than an antipolygamy law was constitutional, then came their manifesto abandoning polygamy.

As one of the representatives of a State where the Mormons are one-fourth of the people, I join with the Senator from Utah, who is in part a representative of a State where three-fourths are Mormons, in saying that there is no polygamy, that is new polygamy, in those parts of the country. I doubt if the gentlemen on the other side are sincere in quibbling over this proposition. If they are sincere let them put the Idaho test oath, or provide for its being put into the constitution of these new States. The test oath is a dead letter in Idaho now, and the recent comers do not know it is in our State constitution. No one wants to take it out, but there is no occasion for its enforcement. Should the occasion arise its power would be invoked.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from New York permit me?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Concerning the proposition of the Senator from Idaho, it is perhaps proper that I should speak.

I have never questioned the sincerity of a Senator upon this floor, and I never expect to do so. If the Senator is anxious to have this antipolygamy clause put on this bill or any bill that may be passed, why does he ask a condition? Why does he say, "I am willing to purchase the attachment of the statehood bill to an appropriation bill by conceding an antipolygamy amendment?"

Mr. DUBOIS. Does the Senator want me to answer him?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes.

Mr. DUBOIS. For the reason that it is perfectly apparent to everyone that, so far as the Senator from Indiana is concerned, we will never have a vote on the statehood proposition; and I simply took this method of informing him that, in my judgment, we will have a vote on it upon an appropriation bill, and I anticipate it in advance and say that I am ready for this amendment. I am not anxious for the amendment and do not want it, because it is not necessary. Polygamy is dead and can not be made more dead.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If that is so, Mr. President, there was no use of the Senator putting forth his proposition to barter. He said some two or three weeks ago with great earnestness that a vote was to be had, and so forth; and we had a debate that afternoon, which it is not necessary here to repeat. But if the Senator again repeats that he is going to have a vote in the extraordinary way now proposed, why should he put forth his proposition to barter upon this question?

The Senator made a clear and powerful speech the other day to the effect that some legislation as an antipolygamy amendment to this or any bill was not necessary because polygamy was no longer practiced. The Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] said to-day, in his usually clear way of speaking, that there was not any use of adopting even what is in the omnibus bill on this subject.

Now, if this be so, and if the Senator is going to have an attachment of a statehood measure to an appropriation bill, why does he put forward this proposition to barter or to purchase that attachment by a thing which he says is not necessary because it no longer exists?

Now, then, I will put this question to the Senator or any person representing the bill. If we want an antipolygamy amendment as strong as can be drawn, as strong as perhaps the moral sentiment of the people of the United States thinks should be drawn, why quibble about it at all? Why not go on record right now as saying, "Yes, here and now, without ifs and ands, we accept anything you can draw." That is the question.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, I listened with great interest to the speech of the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] and also to the speech of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART]. I find that everyone who apologizes for the Mormon Church is in favor of this statehood bill. That is one of the curious developments of this discussion. I would not criticise Nevada, and I am sorry that her distinguished Senators have left the Chamber; but in the decadence of that State from a population of 62,000 down to 42,000 in 1900 I am glad, and I know the country will be, to be assured that now there are multitudes of farmers pouring into her valleys and that in a short time she will line up alongside of New York in population and production.

But, sir, the best contribution that Nevada has made to the wealth of the country has been the two Senators whom she has kept here for a quarter of a century.

When I heard my friend from Nevada speaking in that glowing and patriarchal way of the pleasures he enjoyed in Mormon families fifty years ago, and as he passed from the capital to Nevada, what comfort, what peace, what family relations, what observance of every family requirement by the father and mother and children he witnessed, and how pleased he was with it, I could not help recalling a lecture I once heard by Artemus Ward, that great humorist, nearly forty years ago, delivering his lecture then upon Utah, which was to us in the East an unknown country. This is what I remember of his visit to a Mormon family of whom he spoke in much the same glowing terms as did the Senator from Nevada. He said:

Having delivered a lecture in Salt Lake City, I received a note from a Mormon widow saying that she was greatly bereaved and wishing me to call upon her in the family circle. As I entered the parlor she held out to me her lily-white hand—seventeen of them. [Laughter.]

Now, this patriarchal relation is one which has been condemned as no other institution that has existed among any sect in the United States.

I thoroughly agree with all that has been said by the Senator from Nevada on the question of religious freedom and religious toleration. Every man and every woman in this country has a right to any creed which they choose to adopt and any creed which they choose to profess. They have a right to practice their religion anywhere and everywhere so long as that religion in its practice does not strike at the foundations of the family and at the morality of the State.

There can be a so-called religion, sir, which steps beyond the bounds of religious freedom and of religious toleration. There can be a so-called religion, sir, which can be made a cloak for immorality, which can be made a cloak for crime, which can be made a cloak for the purpose of breaking up the family circle, which can be made a cloak for the degradation of womanhood and for the corruption of childhood.

Any law which permits, or any law which does not prohibit and punish penally, a religion of that kind is unworthy of a free country and of a free people. We stand, as the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] in one part of his speech has said, for absolute freedom of conscience and absolute toleration of religion; but it must be religion, and not immorality, not crime.

Mr. President, why this sensitiveness on the part of the advocates of this bill about immediately divorcing themselves from Mormonism? I take issue with my friend from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] on his proposition that we solidify Mormons, that we prevent them from leaving their faith, that we estop them from surrendering their tenets; that, if they are bigoted, we make them more bigoted by discussing their religion or by assailing them upon this floor.

Nobody assails the Mormon as such. Nobody assails the Mormon religion as such. If the Mormons choose to believe the revelations made by Smith and by Brigham Young, that is their affair. If they choose to regard them as saints and their books as the real Bible, that is their affair. If they choose, within the law, to worship according to the tenets of those revelations, they stand on the plane which the Christian Scientists and others do, who believe differently from the tenets that are entertained by evangelical churches or by those who have no religion at all. It is not on their faith, it is not on the book of Mormon, it is not on their religious practices, it is not on their temples that we are discussing this proposition here to-day, but it is because they have never really and actually abandoned the tenets of polygamy, and there is a wide suspicion that they have not in secret abandoned its practice.

The Senator from Nevada recalled the fact that a member of the other House who had been elected from Utah was expelled from the last Congress. Sir, why was he expelled? Because he believed in the book of Mormon? No. Because he was a Mormon apostle? No. Because he had a creed which was assented to by no single member of the House of Representatives? No. He was expelled because—notwithstanding the professions of the Mormon hierarchy as to the abandonment of polygamy—he would not deny that he was a polygamist, and he defended on the floor polygamy as a sacred and divine institution. He stood there as the representative of the church before the whole nation in the most conspicuous attitude possible, in the presence of the representatives of the people and of the country, to defend not Mormonism, but the liberty to live in polygamous relations wherever men believed that that was the proper doctrine to practice.

It has been proved here that a company of Mormons have gone into Mexico and settled there in a place where the Mexican Government wants industry, which those people undoubtedly have, and the concentrated colonization for protection against savages and for the development of agricultural resources, which those people undoubtedly have, but they have gone there because in Mexico they can freely practice polygamy.

Mr. President, the discussion of this Mormon question is legitimate just here for the very reason that at this moment there is no question upon which the American people are more unanimous, no question upon which they are more exigent and more acute than the prohibition by every possible means of the practice of polygamy in any State in the country. They are seeking to secure the adoption of a constitutional amendment so that the Government can reach polygamy in the States. Then why the discussion here? Simply because the moment that this Territory comes into the Union as a State, that moment the Edmunds law no longer is effective, that moment the Federal court no longer has jurisdiction.

The moment it is a State that whole question is remitted to the State, and it is free to act as it pleases; and where there is a consolidated minority who, by casting their votes according to the tenets of their church and the order of their spiritual superiors, they will threaten either party with destruction that goes against their wishes. That is the danger that the Senators who favor this bill are inviting, and that is what we who oppose it are endeavoring to prevent.

I do not agree with the Senator from Utah that the true way to meet polygamy is to let the State in, then let the people fight it out, and let civilization and education work their way. If you let in a community where one-fourth or one-fifth or one-sixth or one-twelfth, if you please, are solidly Mormon, where there is no prohibition which is sufficient to meet the case in the organic law, where the Edmunds law can no longer prevail, and the Federal power is weakened, I believe that that minority appealing to the ambitions of party leaders on either side will prevent any legislation or any penal statute which will deprive them of the right of carrying out the patriarchial tenets of the creed which they believe.

Mr. President, leaving that branch of the subject, I now come to New Mexico and to Arizona in reference to their future. Certainly there has been no presentation made here by anybody as to the present condition of the Territory which lines up either one of these Territories as now possessing every qualification for statehood. The question now is as to the future. It has been urged by advocates—not on this floor, because there have been none here—by advocates in the press and by citizens of New Mexico and Arizona who have come here, that the real merit of Arizona and of New Mexico is in the future; that there is to flow into those Territories, as my eloquent friend from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] says, there is to flow into Nevada, large populations and manifold industries.

But we have, in regard to Arizona, this extraordinary position: She has only 122,000 people, of whom 27,000 are Indians. Of her 95,000 people, 20,000 are unmarried men. There is no such proportion of celibacy anywhere in the United States; and it is exceedingly refreshing, I will say to my friend from Utah, to proceed from the discussion of polygamy to the question of celibacy. Twenty thousand out of 95,000 inhabitants are single men. What does that mean? It means that Arizona is largely a mining camp; it means that a large proportion of its population are not genuine settlers; that they are not there to stay; that they are the active, adventurous young men proceeding from every neighborhood in the country seeking their fortunes in mines; that they are prospecting in the mountains, and they are abiding where they can discover a lode, which they may work or which they may take East and sell. They have no real interests in the Territory, and they are not and never will be part of its permanent population.

So the population of the Territory grows and diminishes according as they discover mines or as there is a rush when statements are made that, in this range of mountains or in that, tremendous opportunities for getting rich suddenly are in sight for those who have the courage to go to the wilderness to seek their fortunes.

But, sir, you can not build a State on a mining population and on a shifting crowd like this. The best evidence in the world that Arizona presents none of the features which will make her grow and all of the features which will align her alongside of Nevada for all time to come is that in forty years of settlement, in forty years of exploitation, and in forty years of Territorial condition there has been no population going there for the purpose of living upon agriculture and becoming permanent citizens.

In forty years Arizona, out of 73,000,000 acres, has only reduced to cultivation 254,520 acres. New Mexico, after sixty years of Territorial condition, has, out of 78,000,000 acres, only reduced to farming lands 326,873 acres, making the total in those two Territories of only 600,000 acres reduced to cultivation out of 150,000,000 acres, while in Oklahoma, which has only been ten years a Territory, 6,000,000 acres have been reduced to farms; and in the Indian Territory, where the difficulties are so great for the white settler, 400,000 Americans going in there have reduced 3,000,000 acres to farms. So you see in Oklahoma and you see in the Indian Territory all the elements that constitute a State—you see the soil, you see the opportunities, you see the invitation to the settler, and you see that he becomes a farmer and a citizen of the Territory.

Mr. President, on this subject I have here in the Cincinnati Enquirer of February 9 an interview with Judge D. A. Richardson, a prominent attorney and gold-mine president of Nogales, Ariz., and I ask the Secretary to read the interview.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

TALK OF THE TOWN.

Judge D. A. Richardson, a prominent attorney and gold-mine president, of Nogales, Ariz., is in the city, accompanied by Dr. A. L. Gustler, of Walnut Hills, this city, who went to Nogales a year ago to practice his profession. Mr. Richardson went to the Territory several years ago from Galveston, Tex. "None of the taxpayers or bona fide residents of Arizona—by bona fide I mean that class of men who are there to make it their permanent home, and not those ready to grab something and then hie away to better opportunities—desire statehood," remarked Mr. Richardson, "for out of the population of 140,000 the temporary residents constitute a large proportion, outside of Indians.

The white people do not exceed 75,000. Our tax rate is now $4.10 on the $100, and property is assessed at its full value. Our schools are maintained solely by license taxes collected from gamblers. These taxes are $30 a month on each gambling table. It is a simple proposition of gambling and schools or no gambling and no schools.

If we had statehood, there would be no license, because there is none in any other State, though gambling does prevail, with an occasional raid of the houses. If we were given statehood, it would run 50 per cent of the people out on account of the taxes alone.

At present there are no taxes on unpatented mines; consequently the poor miners are enabled to work small prospects and ship the highest grades of ore, but if we had statehood it would be necessary to tax everything in the country to its full limit, including the output of unpatented mines, and that would drive half the small miners out of the business. I was surprised to see that the question of polygamy has not been raised by Senator BEVERIDGE, for if Arizona is admitted by the omnibus bill as it is now worded no one can say what would result as to what polygamy might be. There are three large counties where the Mormons have majorities. The Government now pays large sums for the support of the Territorial government which could not be forthcoming if we had statehood.

I can not see any advantage to be derived from statehood, and only a few politicians who are after office want it. I do not believe the Republican party will weaken its policies, indorsed by two national elections, by admitting two Democratic Territories, for the Democrats are undoubtedly in the large majority in the Territory. As to irrigation, if the Government were to spend $100,000,000 on reservoirs there would not be enough water to furnish one-fifth of the Territory where the sands are 14 feet deep. Arizona is essentially a barren waste of mining camps, but after you have lived there for a time you would not give it up for any price, on account of its glorious climate and consequent healthful exhilaration.

Mr. DEPEW. In the same connection, Mr. President, and in another Cincinnati paper I find an interview with Dr. A. L. Gustetter, former City Hospital interne, who, this paper states, is at the Gibson House with D. A. Richardson, president of the Oneida Consolidated Gold and Copper Company, of Nogales, Ariz., of which Gustetter is secretary and part owner. Dr. Gustetter says they are elated over the wealth of the Territory's mining interests, but say that the lack of rain prevents agriculture and cattle raising. Of the 140,000 "inhabitants," Gustetter declares only 25,000 are "citizens," the rest being bent on making money and getting out to their homes in the "States."

Dr. Gustetter is practicing medicine in Nogales, but says that the climate is conducive to good health, so there is more money in mining. A small capital invested there, he says, and backed up by the same amount of business energy as in the States is bound to bring success.

The rainfall in these Territories, according to the Hydrographic Survey and the Geological Survey of the United States, is 1 inch per month, and two-thirds of that during the summer is absorbed by the sand as fast as it falls, while in New York it is 43 inches, in Massachusetts 43, in Georgia 44, and more in the agricultural States of the West.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DEPEW. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit me to call his attention to the fact that the governor of New Mexico in his last report, and I think in every report for perhaps the last three or four years, has called attention very particularly to the fact that the Senator from New York has casually called attention to, that the rainfall in New Mexico—and of course the same is true in Arizona—within a very short time after it has fallen disappears, and the ground is as dry as it was before. It disappears by absorption.

Very frequently these rains fall in very heavy showers, sometimes called torrential showers, and when they do so fall, the water runs immediately off into arroyos or gullies and sinks into the ground or is absorbed into the atmosphere, so that the soil within two hours, I think the governor of New Mexico states in his report, is quite as dry as before the downpour. I have called attention to that because the governor of New Mexico himself calls attention to that fact in a very interesting page in his report upon the subject of the aridity of New Mexico and its causes and results.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, another evidence that there is no future, so far as population is concerned, for these two Territories is that New Mexico and Arizona in forty years have gained only 1.1 to the square mile in population, while Oklahoma in ten years has gained 14 to the square mile in population. In the one case you have stagnation and retrogression; in the other you have the elements that constitute a State.

But in considering what constitutes a State, when a Territory is to be admitted, we must have regard to the character of the population; we must have a regard for their literacy or illiteracy; to the educational systems which they have adopted, and to their conforming to those conditions which not only show American citizenship, but which permit American citizenship to be made in the coming generations.

On the question of illiteracy we have in the United States the lowest percentage of any country in the world. Owing to our magnificent common-school system in those States where there are the population and the wealth which permit the expense of the education of the people, there are in the schools of the country to-day 16,000,000 American boys and girls. The result of a school system so beneficent and so wise is that the average of illiteracy in the United States is only about 6 per cent; and you must remember that in getting at that 6 per cent the general average is increased by the illiteracy among the negroes in the South, by the illiteracy among the Indians, and by the illiteracy among the Mexicans in New Mexico. While the illiteracy of the whole country under those handicaps is only 6 per cent, while the illiteracy of Oklahoma, only ten years a Territory, is only 6 per cent, the illiteracy of Arizona is 27 and the illiteracy of New Mexico is 32 per cent.

In considering the attributes of statehood, I ask what would be the result in any one of our great States which constitute this Republic if, over the age of 10 years, 1 of every 3 of the inhabitants could neither read nor write? I ask if before admitting Territories as States where 1 of every 3 of the inhabitants can neither read nor write, if we ought not to apply to them the old Scriptural injunction, "Tarry at Jericho until your beards be grown?" I know of no handicap to good citizenship like ignorance—like illiteracy—in its worst form.

It has been urged here as an excuse for the illiteracy of these Territories, and as an argument that their citizens will be worthy of the citizenship of the United States, that every year we admit through our various ports from the different countries of Europe immigrants among whom the average of illiteracy is 33 per cent. I regret, as everybody else does, that the immigration of the country in the last ten years has fallen off from the high average of material for making good citizenship which prevailed during all the preceding part of our history. I have advocated and sustained here with all my might a bill which would restrict immigration into this country to those who are worthy of our citizenship by character, by equipment, and by education.

But because we have made a mistake heretofore by leaving the bars down for ignorance to come in, anarchy to come in, nonsupport to come in, pauperism and crime to come in, is no excuse to hold that up as a rule for our guidance for the future even on immigration. This Congress ought not adjourn until it has placed upon the statute books a law which will protect our citizenship against this degenerate or unworthy immigration into our country.

But, sir, there is a great difference even between these immigrants and the Mexican population of New Mexico. These immigrants, 500,000 of them, if you please, scattered about in the States among 75,000,000 people, are lost in the general average, and by contact, environment, and association are rapidly lifted up until by the time they get out their papers and are entitled to vote most of them are able to read, and they become good citizens. Then there is another difference between them and the Mexican population in New Mexico. In the second generation the racial differences disappear. In the second generation the boys and girls have gone to the common schools. They have an American education. They have become imbued with American ideas and American principles, and in the second generation they are just as good citizens as those whose ancestry has been for hundreds of years or more on this soil. But see the difference in New Mexico. We acquired New Mexico practically in 1846. To-day, according to the governor of New Mexico, there are 45,000 more Mexicans in New Mexico than there are Americans. Of the 195,000 inhabitants of New Mexico only 75,000 are Americans.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Where does the Senator get those figures? I think that proportion of what are known as Americans, as shown by the analysis of the census returns, is extremely high.

Mr. DEPEW. I think it is. I think it is 10,000 too high.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator will have a careful analysis made of the census figures, I think he will find that the proportion of those known down there as Mexicans and the proportion of those known down there as Americans are considerably different from the figures he has given; that is to say, a larger percentage are what are known as Mexicans than the Senator gets from the figures there. That is the reason why I asked the question where he got those figures.

Mr. DEPEW. I got them from the speech of one of the Senators in behalf of the statehood bill——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I think that is hardly entirely reliable when subjected to careful and scientific test.

Mr. DEPEW. In which he admitted, as I thought, all that was necessary for the purpose of this argument.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator says that is the statehood advocates' admission, that is all right. However, I hardly think the proportions he gives are accurate, according to the analysis of the census figures; certainly not according to the observations of the subcommittee. I think the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] will bear me out.

Mr. DEPEW. My impression is that the real figures would be a hundred and ninety-five thousand total population——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes.

Mr. DEPEW. A hundred and twenty thousand Mexicans——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. More than that.

Mr. DEPEW. Twenty-seven thousand Indians and the rest Americans.

For sixty years, or two full generations, or if you count those who were past mature age when we acquired the Territory, three full generations, this enormous majority of the inhabitants of New Mexico have remained Mexicans. They have remained Mexicans in language, Mexicans in tradition, Mexicans in habits and associations, and Mexicans in their methods of life. They have resisted, until ten years ago, the introduction of any school system, and most of them are unable to read either the English or the Spanish language. Those of them who can read at all can read only the Spanish language and understand only the Spanish tongue.

Now, see the difference between them and your illiterate immigrants. Here is your Mexican father of 1846, a Mexican, speaking the Spanish language. He becomes a citizen of the United States and his son he brings up a Mexican, speaking the Spanish language. His grandson is brought up a Mexican, speaking the Spanish language, and his great grandson is brought up a Mexican, speaking the Spanish language. There is no testimony that there is any change as yet in this racial and lingual isolation from the other people of that Territory and the people of the United States.

These conditions produce results, so far as justice is concerned, which are a revelation and a reversal of all our ideas of courts and of juries and of the administration of justice. The interpreter is as much an officer of their courts as is the sheriff or the clerk. Even in the sacred precincts of the jury room the interpreter must go for the purpose of interpreting the testimony as he heard it and the argument of counsel on either side as he understood it to the Mexicans on the jury who did not understand it. This occurs both in civil and in criminal actions.

Not only that, but in political conventions there must always be an interpreter to interpret to the Spanish delegates the nominating speeches and the resolutions that are adopted. The interpreter is as much an officer of their legislature as are the clerks of their upper and their lower houses.

There has been testimony here, gathered by the committee, to the effect that when it comes to election, the vast majority of the Mexican voters can not read the ballot; that it has to be explained to them. They do not vote by names; they do not vote by party affiliations, because, being Spaniards, practically, they can not understand it, but they vote by emblems. The leader of the county goes among his constituents and says to them, "You must vote for the rooster," or "You must vote for the coyote," and, understanding that, when the electorate come to the polls, they vote as the party leader has said—for the rooster or for the coyote.

Mr. President, if this Territory comes in as a State under these conditions what will be the result? The white population is scattered in the towns. The agriculture is almost wholly in the hands of the Mexicans. Therefore in that apportionment which must necessarily come, according to territorial lines, the Mexicans will control the country districts all over the State. Their votes are cast by the party leaders for the man who has their confidence.

Generations of them in slavery for over two hundred years, down to 1865, has left a hereditary desire to be led. So one ambitious and one strong man in whom they have confidence casts the vote of the county, casts the vote of the town, casts the vote of the legislative district. Necessarily in the legislature, which will elect two United States Senators to this body, there will be a majority of Mexicans, and of Mexicans coming from the conditions which the testimony reveals.

In the antagonism that will then come up, which has been going on for a thousand years between the Latin and the Anglo-Saxon, does anybody believe that these Mexicans, controlling a majority of the legislative districts and a majority of the legislature, will surrender to the Anglo-Saxon the prize of the United States Senatorships? They may on the first election, for the first terms, divide between a Mexican and an American; but if I know anything of Latin characteristics and Latin ambitions, if I know anything of the Latin hanging together and acting in common and in concert, the whole future for a generation will be that in this Chamber will sit two Mexicans from New Mexico representing as Senators that State.

I myself have been almost thrilled at the pictures, presented in lurid language by my Democratic brethren, of the horrible condition which would prevail if there came into this Chamber Spaniards from Cuba, Porto Ricans from Porto Rico, citizens from Hawaii and Guam and Tutuila, and also representatives from the Malay Archipelago—the Philippines. And yet they are endeavoring to create a condition for party purposes to let in two Mexicans into this body for all time to come.

The history of New Mexico is one of the romances of American settlement. Twenty years before the Pilgrims landed on Plymouth Rock, and in the cabin of the Mayflower adopted that constitution which was an epoch in the history of the world, for the first time declaring that they were to form a government founded upon just and equal laws, there were a government and Spanish population in New Mexico.

There were a government and Spanish population in New Mexico before Pocahontas saved Capt. John Smith, or before immigrants were to be found in Charleston or anywhere along our Atlantic coast, and even before the Spaniards were in Florida there were a settlement and a government and a governor in New Mexico. So here we have a Territory which has been settled by Europeans and has had some form of government for over three hundred years.

How does that three hundred years, commencing twenty years before Plymouth Rock with its 41 inhabitants, compare with Plymouth Rock? Seven hundred people settled in New Mexico twenty years before 41 landed upon Plymouth Rock. From those 41 on Plymouth Rock have come, by the common consent of mankind, the institutions of the United States; the liberties not only of the American people, but of mankind all over the world; the commonwealths which largely go to make up the American Union; and the principles which enacted into laws and permeating the population and taught in the schoolhouses, the academies, and the colleges, made the American nation and its people what they are to-day—principles which by virtue of their all-pervading and uplifting power have gone through every nation and have changed the form of government in every civilized nation in the world.

Now, compare what has come from those 41 Pilgrims to what has come from these 700 Spaniards. They have remained during the whole of these three hundred years practically what they were when they first entered New Mexico. Compare these 700 Spaniards and the growth during the three hundred years of the country in which they settled with the settlement of Illinois. Practically the settlement of Illinois began in 1800, and New Mexico had two hundred years the start. And yet Illinois to-day in population, in cities, in industries, in manufactures, in agriculture, in schools, in colleges, in universities, in railroads, in telegraphs, in telephones, in newspapers, in magazines, and in the literary productions of its people would, if it stood alone among the nations of the world, be recognized as a great commonwealth, with every requisite of power and of majesty, of happiness for its people and of example for the world. It almost appalls the imagination to think of these people, who are to govern the State, existing as they have right upon this continent, bordering upon us, and for sixty years a part of us, in such a condition as they are to-day.

The settlement of the northern and the southern colonies went on without their knowledge. The great debate of the right to tax without representation which preceded the Revolutionary war shook the world—was a subject of discussion in every cabinet in Europe—but it was unknown, unheard of, in this New Mexican colony. The war of the Revolution dragged its bloody lengths along for seven years. The Declaration of Independence emancipated the world, but the colony of New Mexico never heard of the Revolution, never heard of the Declaration. Ninety per cent of its people were slaves to their own people. The territory was divided into great haciendas with one supreme family master of life, of limb, and of liberty, and all the rest were its peons or slaves, attached to the soil.

After the Revolution and the Declaration of Independence came the French Revolution, that mighty upheaval which overturned thrones and emancipated the whole Continent of Europe. But New Mexico never heard of it. Napoleon, who, whatever may be the charges as to his motives or his crimes or whatever may be said as to his achievements, did more than any man in Europe for civilization—Napoleon's great victories, his wonderful conquests, his dramatic defeat, his exile on a barren rock, all passed by. New Mexico never heard of them. New Mexico knew nothing of them.

And New Mexico would be sleeping to-day in the sleep of ignorance, which is the sleep of mental death, except that the great emancipator, Abraham Lincoln, whose birthday was celebrated all over the country yesterday, by his proclamation struck the bonds from the limbs of every bondman, black or white or of whatever color, in this land. But the Mexican did not hear of it. The Mexican did not know it, and he would not have discovered it except that in 1865 a Colorado army swept through the country, driving back the Confederates who had almost captured it, and then the army said to the Mexicans, "You are free."

Now, my friends, I have been told that if I made a speech of this kind—in fact, I was told by a New Mexican politician—"If you make a speech of this kind, you will surely make New Mexico Democratic for all time to come. The orators will travel up and down New Mexico, and they will repeat this speech, and when they do we will be driven off the stump. We will have no opportunity to win. We will not be anywhere." But, my friends, the orator has to translate this speech into Spanish [laughter], and then he has to try to make somebody believe that I delivered it.

But when that interpreter interprets the Spanish there is only one question which will arise in the mind of that New Mexican audience. They were Democrats once. Their sole industry is wool and sheep. But along about 1894 and 1895 they found that the wool for which they had been getting 30 cents a pound was selling for 7, and the sheep for which they had been getting $5 a piece were selling for a dollar and a half. Then these Mexican farmers, who had been peons or slaves up to 1865, rushed to the county leader and said, "Who has done this? We are ruined.

We can not raise sheep for a dollar and a half and we starve on wool at less than 20 cents a pound."
